The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yet to-day we have him as the new leader on the Democratic side. Frankly, I feel sorry for anybody who tries to lead the Democratic side during the next year, because it is the most disorganized group politically that has ever yet been disorganized. [Applause.] This new leader will still be making the same charges. And, you know, it is rather interesting to me to hear the gentleman from Alabama invoking the shades of Lincoln and talking about what Lincoln would do. I do not think that Lincoln or the present President would do what Grover Cleveland did, although he probably did right at that time, when he called out the National Guard and the troops. I know the present President would not do it, because he said definitely—though I am not quoting him accurately but in substance, because I do not have his exact remarks before me—that no American citizen will ever be permitted to starve in this period of depression. That no one would be permitted to starve.

Mr. MANLOVE. And that no American citizen has starved.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. And that no American has starved, and that is exactly true. [Applause.] I have grave doubt about your Democratic leadership, because the Democrats will be like an army; and you can not make an army out of a disorganized mob going in different directions, thinking different things, and having different equipment. But if you do succeed in making an army out of it and will follow the suggestions of the President of the United States, Mr. Hoover, our people will not starve; and in anything looking toward that end you will get the cooperation of this side, just as it gave cooperation to President Wilson at a time when there was a complete Democratic administration. [Applause.]

This demonstration of Democratic leadership in these times of distress is rather illustrative of what will happen during the rest of the session. I think the Democratic Party to-day ought to get busy and organize the committees and get to work, instead of putting a group of men on the floor of the House to attack the President of the United States and make all sorts of accusations against every branch of the Government.

The present situation, in so far as the Nation is concerned, is much as it was in 1918 when we had foreign difficulties. The situation to-day is not the fault of the present administration, because it would have been the same had Al Smith or anybody else been elected. It is because of a world-wide condition and depression, and through it all the present President has done much that has been helpful and of great advantage to the Nation. More than $100,000,000 has been collected through private sources; and if more is necessary, as stated by the present President, you will find a unanimous vote on this side of the House. The Republican side of the House will be glad to join with President Hoover in seeing that no American citizen is starving or will be permitted to starve. It seems to me you should be willing to quit talking and commence the enactment of the necessary legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, of course if the Republican Party has nothing more to talk about during this entire session than to pick out some man like our friend HUDDLESTON, who is one of the best-informed men in this House on either side upon the question of government—if that is all you are going to do, you are going to be in bad shape.

I want to say to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] that it is true the Republicans went along with the administration during the course of the war, but after the armistice was signed, in November, 1918—if the Democrats on this side do not give Mr. Hoover any more support than you gave Mr. Wilson, God save Mr. Hoover and the American people.

Mrs. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCKEOWN. Certainly I will yield.

Mrs. KAHN. The gentleman certainly does not question Julius Kahn's support of President Wilson? [Applause.]

Mr. MCKEOWN. I want to say for the benefit of Mr. Kahn that he was loyal when he was in the minority. I never heard a question raised touching his support of the President at all during his entire service. He was a great man, but I do not ascribe the qualities that he possessed to other leaders who are known in this House and whose attitude is well known.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Did the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] support Mr. Wilson so strongly during that time? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. McKEOWN. The gentleman from Alabama always spoke his mind and never paraded his patriotism. He has been a consistent Democrat. He is a good Member of this House. You can get up here and laugh and talk about the Democrats not being solid and all that kind of stuff, but the American people to-day want to know where is that prosperity around the corner that you have been talking about. They have looked for it so long that they have even lost the corner. [Laughter and applause.]

I want to ask you something else. We have been asked to provide for the people of this country. What has the Republican Party done in this respect? You have put a little money down here in a public-building program and the program has been moving so slowly that everybody would starve to death while waiting for you to build the buildings.

There are thousands of unemployed in your own districts, and the only thing you say is, "Put your money into the community chests and take care of your own people."

There is no use for us to get up here and wrangle around about a situation that is so serious, and you gentlemen know the situation is serious. You know there has to be some constructive, financial legislation enacted in this country. Here we are with $4,000,000,000 in circulation, which is less money per capita than there was over 12 years ago. What we want to do is to increase the per capita circulation in this country. This can be done, and the Democrats on this side will propose a program that will carry out this purpose; and if you men favor it, then come along with us.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What will that program be?

Mr. McKEOWN. Well, sir, it will be a good one when it comes. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will it be paper or silver or what?

Mr. McKEOWN. I will tell the gentleman that it will not be hot air like we have been getting from the Republican side. We will have some real relief. We are not going to talk about it; we are going to give you a chance to join us in putting it into effect.

My friends, we hear the proposition advanced now that we have got to support the President. Of course, we will support the President in any emergency when we think the President is right. We have always done this, and will do so in the future; but, gentlemen, I am going to tell you now that we do not propose in advance to underwrite the presidential campaign platform for the next Republican convention. We will go along on the things that will relieve the people of this country, and there will be many measures offered here.

You gentlemen talk about the dole. I say here now that every man in this country who is able and well is entitled to have a job, but there are a million men in this country that do not work when there is work, and for my part I am in favor of giving every man a job and making every man that ought to work go to work in this country.

You say that you can not handle this proposition. It can be handled by giving labor to the unemployed; but when you pour out money to men without giving them labor, you are demoralizing the whole country [applause], and the longer a man stays out of a job the harder it is going to be to get him to go back to work. I am criticizing the Republican administration for its failure to put these men to work as soon as possible.

What do you propose to do in order to put these men to work in the present emergency? The State of Oklahoma will have to put its own men to work.

What is your program? What do you offer as a solution? If you say public works, then you have to speed up on the building of these public buildings, and this is only a small per cent of the building program of the country.

The President has presented a plan with respect to home-building banks. Home ownership is the foundation of a nation. While the President is advocating relief for urban home owners, the Federal land banks are taking homes from farmers and putting them in the section lines. I have protested, and what did they say? They said they were going to foreclose their mortgages when they did not pay, and yet at the same time they urge us to vote for a moratorium for foreign people in foreign countries.

I have protested to the Federal land banks that this ought to be stopped and that the mortgages on these homes should not be foreclosed and the men driven out of doors, but that they should be given a chance. I know a man who has met all his payments for 15 years, but this year he can not meet his interest. We wrote the Federal land bank and asked them to give this man a stay and let the matter go over another year, stating that he would pay additional interest on his loan. They refused absolutely to do this.

Gentlemen, this Congress ought to immediately provide some way by which this can be stopped. You are talking here about helping unemployment, and at the same time a part of the administration is putting men out on the section lands and adding to the unemployment; and then you say we are to go down into our pockets and help feed these men that you are taking from places where they could feed themselves.

My friends, it would not take 30 minutes for the President of the United States to issue an order to these men to stop this proceeding.

All right. Here is what is the matter with your banking system to-day in this country. You have got only four billions of currency in circulation and you are entitled to twelve billions under the best authority upon economics.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield.

Mr. MANLOVE. Is it not a fact that the Federal land banks do business with the money that they receive from the sale of bonds which are owned by private individuals all over the country?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes; the United States Government put up the first capital and pays the salaries of the officials of the land bank's board.

Mr. MANLOVE. And all the money comes from the sale of the bonds owned by these individuals and the officials of the banks have to take care of these bond owners all over the United States?

Mr. McKEOWN. Oh, it is well known that they sacrifice the land for one-half of its value.

Mr. MANLOVE. I regret that it is necessary to foreclose, but is it not necessary?

Mr. McKEOWN. I will tell you how they work it. When the farmer fails to pay here is what they do. They go around the neighborhood and find some fellow who has got money in the bank and sell it to him for half of what the debt is and take the rest out of the farmers' association. Then they buy their own bonds.

Mr. MANLOVE. Can the gentleman cite an instance where the officials of the Federal land banks have gone out and sold the mortgage for one-half of what it was worth?

Mr. McKEOWN. I say they sell the man out after they close down. They go to some one and say, "Give me $5,000 for this farm, which is worth probably $10,000."

Mr. MANLOVE. Is it not a fact that the land banks loan this money by a local committee of your own citizens?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes. I will tell you what they do. The local committee makes the loan and then the inspector comes down and finds that John Smith can not pay and they go to some one who has got money in the bank and say,

"Give me $5,000 for this good farm." And the balance comes out of the farmers' association.

Mr. MANLOVE. I am not complaining about the gentleman's argument, and it is rather a bad situation. If the gentleman has any constructive suggestion I believe gentlemen on this side of the aisle will cooperate with him in that direction.

Mr. McKEOWN. On the first day of the session of the last Congress I introduced a bill to stay execution for one year and to-day I am introducing another bill to stay execution or foreclosure for 12 months.

Mr. MANLOVE. Are you providing that the Federal Government shall take care of the bondholders?

Mr. McKEOWN. They can take care of them if they want to, and you have the recommendation of the President to take care of them. The bankers of this country need some relief from the arbitrary dictation on the part of these men who are sent around to examine them. They go into a bank and tell the banker he has to charge this or that paper off, no matter whether it is right to take it out or not. Of coure, a lot of discretion should be used, but when the bank examiner comes down to examine a bank in Colorado or Oklahoma and finds there farm paper and he says without any excuse or explanation that the banker has to take that farm paper out and that he ought to put his money in bonds in New York, the banker has no recourse, he has to do it. It is right that a bank examiner should have a lot of power to keep banks going straight, but it was never intended that the banking system should be put in the hands of Wall Street, where they can dictate and tell bankers what they must invest in.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one minute more in order that I may ask him a question to clear the record up. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. The name of Mr. Julius Kahn, a former beloved Member of this House, has been brought into this debate. The gentleman was here, as several of us were at the time, and I ask him whether it is not the fact that it was Julius Kahn, a Republican, who led the President's fight on the floor of this House.

Mr. McKEOWN. That is true.

Mr. PURNELL. From the Military Affairs Committee. And that he did it because another gentleman, who was chairman of that committee, coming from Alabama, refused to do it.

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes; that is true.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, we have had a rather unusual exhibition here to-day, one which I fear will carry little encouragement to the country as to what it may expect from the party which has just taken over the control of this House. We have had put forward here to-day as the first champion of the party now in power in the House a man who has sounded a keynote. He says that his utterances are his own sentiments, but they were very heartily applauded on the Democratic side, which warrants the fear that those sentiments find lodgement in other minds as well as in that of the gentleman who uttered them.

This keynote speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has been so thoroughly answered by those who have spoken from the Republican side that it really needs no further answer. In fact, the gentleman's speech has been torn to shreds and tatters. There is just one fragment of it left which has not been referred to on the Republican side, and I have taken this brief time to call the attention of the House to it.

Much has been said here to-day in regard to fairness. We have heard reiterated the sentiment—let us be fair with the public and with one another. It is my desire now to be perfectly fair to my friends on the opposite side, but the gentleman from Alabama was not fair to the President in one statement which thus far has not been answered from the Republican side.

Of course, I can not recall from memory the gentleman's exact words, but after asserting that the President is determined that no power of the Government shall be used for the relief of those who are starving, he declares that the President has no such opposition to aid for business. The gentleman avers that the President would aid agriculture, he would aid the railroads, he would give a dole to building and loan associations and to real-estate adventurers. He accuses the President of being willing to place at the disposal of industry and business the vast powers of the Government and the resources of the Federal Treasury, but unwilling to aid the poor and needy. Hearing the gentleman, one would think the President contemplates taking billions from the Treasury to be handed over to business corporations or to foreign nations. The gentleman closes this portion of his speech with an impassioned charge against the President substantially as follows: With his hundreds of millions he would come to the aid of the land banks, to the aid of commercial banks, to the aid of the railroads, and to the aid of industry of one kind or another. To these interests he would give millions, but for the starving women and children he would not give a red cent. And then there followed great applause on the Democratic side. The gentleman well knows that any aid given or contemplated to any bank, railroad, loan association, or anyone else, is for the sake of the millions of those who are employed by or have their savings invested in these institutions and because of the tragic consequences that would follow their collapse or failure.

The most unfair portion of the gentleman's accusation, however, is that which attempts to characterize the President as one who regards material things only but remains cold and indifferent to human suffering. I need but direct the attention of both sides of this chamber to the record of the man who is now President of the United States before he came to that high office.

Who was it who undertook to organize the charity of the world, to collect the money and to administer relief to the starving women and children of Belgium? It was Herbert Hoover. [Applause.] Later, when they were starving in Poland, Rumania, Serbia, Russia, and Germany, who again marshaled the heart of the charitable world, organized the collection of funds, and administered relief? It was Herbert Hoover. Later still, when there was a great disaster in our own fair Southland in the Delta of the Mississippi, when people were flooded out of their homes, were suffering deprivation, and hunger, so that there was necessity for organizing and administering relief to them, who was it who caused $20,000,000 to be raised and was sent there to administer the relief? It was the man who was known by the people of the United States to have the heart, the soul, and the executive ability to organize and handle that situation. It was the then Secretary of Commerce, now the President of the United States, Herbert Hoover. [Applause on the Republican side.] When we consider that this man has devoted a number of the best years of his life to the service of feeding destitute and starving women and children in stricken countries, our own included, we must realize that it comes with ill grace for anyone to charge him with lacking compassion for the poor and needy. Listen to this heart throb from his brief radio address from Fort Monroe on October 18 last:

> No governmental action, no economic doctrine, no economic plan or project can replace the God-imposed responsibility of the individual man and woman to their neighbors. That is a vital part of the very soul of the people. If we shall gain in this spirit from this painful time, we shall have created a greater and more glorious America. The trial of it is here now. It is a trial of the heart and conscience of individual men and women.

Does this sound like the utterance of the heartless caricature drawn by the gentleman from Alabama? So I say the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama portraying the President of the United States as a hard, sordid, soulless man, unwilling to contribute in any way to the relief of the distressed, is grossly unfair, to say the least. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RAINEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it had not been my intention or expectation to participate in any wise in the program of debate upon this occasion, but some subjects have been injected into it that justify, in my opinion, a short response upon the part of a Representative of the majority side. I am sure that my distinguished and able colleague from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has been very much pleased and gratified that the expression of his views on this occasion have been received with such distinguished importance by his critics upon the minority side.

If he were a vain man, which he is not, he might be justified in some show of egotism by the concentrated fire he has drawn from some of the big guns on the Republican front.

Although he needs no defense at my hands, although his brilliant intellect, his capacity for mental analysis, his understanding of the real fundamentals of political philosophy as conceived by him, are recognized as preeminent, even by you gentlemen on that side, I assert that what he has said, in principle, needs no defense from any Democrat in this House. [Applause.]

Although you gentlemen undertook to distort, to misinterpret—in the opinion of the country—the fact that he employed one specific argument with reference to some measures of relief for the distressed and poverty-stricken and hopeless people in this country by using the word "dole"; although you very unfairly and unjustly attempt to present to the country the proposition that he had, by mere coincidence, been granted time to speak upon this side and thereby became the spokesman on this side, yet, in my deliberate opinion, when the basic propositions expressed by my colleague in his speech are analyzed and understood by the people of this country who are really and tragically suffering on account of the mistakes of the Republican leadership and Republican principles in this country for the last 10 years, they will applaud, in essence, the propositions laid down by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON]. He only undertook to assert some of the broad fundamental propositions that have always had the adherence and support of the Democratic Party, and he was well within his rights. He was assuming an entirely logical attitude, consistent with the historical position of the Democratic Party, when he was calling your attention to the fact that this country needs, in purpose and in action, a revival of some of the old-fashioned, time-tested, simple principles announced by Thomas Jefferson and carried into effect by Andrew Jackson, Grover Cleveland, and Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.]

It is a significant thing that although the Republican Party ever since the Civil War has had practically exclusive control of this Government, with a few exceptions, it so administered affairs in this country when given a long and uninterrupted reign of authority, it so misconceives the real principles of government for a free people, that when the results of its long tenure of authority are realized by the American people they inevitably revert to the principles and to the security of the Democratic faith. [Applause.]

My friend the distinguished gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] referred to the Democratic Party in its present attitude, as a disorganized party. It seems to me that that was a very thoughtless description upon the part of my distinguished friend, for if he had given it consideration for a moment with respect to his own organization, not only nationally but in the House and in the Senate, he would have realized that if there ever has been in recent times a political organization in America that was bankrupt in leadership, decimated in following, without chart or compass for the future, it is the present Republican Party. [Applause.]

The gentleman from South Dakota speaks of our organization as though we were a disorganized mob; yet I point to the fact that in every preliminary caucus that the Democratic Party has had since this Congress was called into session, although we recognize honest differences of opinion in our ranks on many economic and social problems, every action we have taken with respect to the future government of the country as administered through the House of Representatives has been by unanimous vote. [Applause.]

Speaking of disorganization, you have a very distinguished President and a very distinguished Vice President. I say to you that that Vice President of yours is one of the most canny politicians in America. Looking forward to 1932, from the standpoint of organization and probable results, he long debated whether he would ask his party to renominate him for Vice President of the United States or whether he should go back to Kansas and ask his people to send him back to the Senate. After going to Kansas, so we are informed, he held a solemn inquest on the possibilities of the Republican corpse in that State being revived, and he seems to have this conclusion: "Well, we are going to be beaten anyway in the next national election, and I would rather have the honor of being politically interred with Mr. Hoover than being a defeated candidate for the Senate of the United States." [Applause.]

My friend talks about disorganization. Look at the spectacle at the other end of the Capitol this very day. Look at that. It has not been long as history goes since you had undisputed control of both branches of Congress. You rode high in the saddle in those good old days prior to 1928 and 1929.

But your party is so well organized and there exists in its membership such delightful solidarity, speaking about delay in getting down to the transaction of public business, as charged against us by Mr. JOHNSON over in the Senate, with your party in the majority, three days after our organization here that able Senator, who incurred some displeasure, if not indeed much venom, when he called the progressive Western Senators the sons of wild jackasses, can not to-day be nominated by his own party for his present position as President pro tempore. [Applause.] And one final other incident to show the superb harmony of the minority was the statement of a Republican Senator from the President's own State, who recently stated that the greatest favor the President could do his own party would be to announce that he would not be a candidate for renomination.

Oh, my friend from South Dakota, what a delightful example of party solidarity and unity is that to be presented to the public. [Applause.] Clean the Republican stable before you disinfect the Democratic manger.

My friends, do you know why this situation has been so almost dramatically changed in the House of Representatives? I was looking at the RECORD a few days ago about the organization of the House in the Seventy-first Congress. Our late lamented and universally loved Nicholas Longworth, the late Speaker, was the nominee of your party for the speakership and he received, as I remember it, 367 votes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, no; no!

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, what was it? I do not recall.

Mr. KNUTSON. It was not that much.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That great Democrat from Texas, our present Speaker, who was the candidate of our party, received, as I remember it, only 143 votes for the speakership of this House. On Monday last our present Speaker received a clean majority of the total membership.

What has transpired and what is the significance of that almost miraculous overturn of your power in this House? Do you think it was merely an accident? Do you think it was merely a political caprice upon the part of the American people in the selection of their representatives? Do you think it was some mere accidental backwash of public opinion in America? No. You must be convinced that it was because, in the deliberate opinion of all those districts which have changed their representatives, that the Republican Party in Congress was no longer fit to govern the affairs of the Nation. [Applause.] You can not reach any other logical conclusion.

Out in that vast domain of the West—where for many years the party of Jefferson had no representative at all even to feebly be articulate in this body as representing the minority views of that great section of the country—we are happy to learn that there are still left some fragmentary elements of intelligence in that great West and that we now see a Democrat from Oregon, Washington, and that part of the country. [Applause.] Even benighted Michigan offers one bright spot of sanity.

In my opinion it is a political leaven that will leaven the whole loaf in 1932. [Applause.]

It does not seem possible to stop this universal dissatisfaction with the leadership of the Republican Party in this House. We have just seen a typical case of the reversal of public approval in America, when from the district so long and honorably represented by our late colleague, Mr. Ackerman—where they have a normal majority of 35,000—we have a Democrat sitting in that Republican seat by a majority of 2,000.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman a few moments ago made the statement that Mr. Longworth received 367 votes, and I said that would mean you folks had less than 100 on your side. The RECORD shows he received 254.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How many did GARNER receive?

Mr. KNUTSON. One hundred and forty-three.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What was the Republican majority on that vote?

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, there must have been a lot of them who were not voting. [Laughter.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. I thank my friend for the correction. I was not definite.

Mr. KNUTSON. There must have been 38 who did not vote.

Mr. BANKHEAD. They all voted on our side when we came to elect a Speaker this time. [Laughter and applause.] However, it is true that you did not have the political uniformity and solidarity of organization on your side which we had on ours, for as I recall the RECORD the nominee of the Republican caucus received 207 votes and there were some 5 votes scattering. That shows, in answer to my friend from South Dakota, that there must be some little modicum of dissatisfaction in the organization on the Republican side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 15 additional minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let us get back to the question of political solidarity on your part and this great chasm within the ranks of the democracy on this side. You talk about following the President of the United States and how you gave support to Woodrow Wilson during the time of the war. I think the annals of Congress will show that you did give to the Democratic President almost your solid support in providing means for the victorious winning of that war, and it was a tribute to your patriotism in a time of great national peril, but I do not believe there is a man on that side who would believe in his heart that if the conditions had been reversed and we had had a Republican President during the time of the great World War, that men on my side would not have given him, with the same degree of unanimity, their cordial support and following. But are you folks following your President? [Laughter.] If there was anybody in this House who was recognized as a stalwart supporter of the Hoover administration, it was the distinguished and able gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. [Applause.]

During the time when we had up for consideration, when you were in the majority, several perplexing questions of Republican policy, and when there did not exist that political status of unanimity which you now proclaim, and when there was severe division in the ranks on your side, the man who would go to the White House, according to common report, and bring to his side the views and policies of the Republican President was your then Republican leader, Mr. TILSON, of Connecticut, and what reward has he been given for following your President? He has been displaced as leader on your side.

Now, my friend from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM], in the course of this running debate a few minutes ago, asked whoever was occupying the floor at that time—I think it was the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN]—what was going to be the policy of the Democratic Party in its program of undertaking to salvage what it could from this Republican wreck. [Applause.]

Any thoughtful man on that side or on this side, any man of any long and practical political experience here in the House would not expect the Democratic majority, not in control of the White House, not in control of the Senate, to hop up here within two or three days after its organization and propose some concrete and definite formula of legislation for the whole session.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Certainly, I understand the gentleman's statement that it can not be done at this moment, but the gentleman whom I interrogated had announced that there would be a program presented here for increasing the volume of the currency of the country, and I thought he had a plan, of course.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, if the gentleman made the statement that a policy would be announced, that is correct; and I want to say to the gentleman, following up what I had in mind, we are not going to be precipitate about its announcement. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am sure you will not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to say to the gentleman that the Democratic Party in the House of Representatives, realizing that the American people have intrusted us with partial responsibility for legislation, are going to undertake to do nothing intemperately or hurriedly or ill-advisedly; but after sufficient counsel among ourselves in the Senate and in the House, with the leaders here and the leaders there, and with the individuals here and the individuals there, we are not going to attempt a panacea program for all the ills from which the country is suffering, but we do expect to bring in, and we hope we will bring in with solid Democratic support, a policy and a program that will provide some sane and substantial remedial legislation to bring the country out of its present morass of destitution. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am very happy, indeed, that the gentleman has uttered this note of cheer to the country, so that the country may not believe that the opening session of this Congress and the opening of this debate represented the real purposes of the majority party. The gentleman is giving the country now a piece of good cheer.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, I am very pleased that as far as he goes the gentleman commends the utterances in which I am indulging, but I am sure that the gentleman from Illinois will do what he can, and I shall not blame him because he is a partisan Republican and realizes the desperate dilemma in which his own party is placed by virtue of its own ineptitude and its own lack of leadership, and it will be his legitimate function to undertake to harass us as much as possible in the carrying out of this beneficent program which we purpose to bring in for the gentleman's consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is the gentleman, on the part of his party, inviting that course? What reason has the gentleman to say that?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No invitation is necessary. [Laughter and applause.]

I know the type of gentlemen upon that side of the House who are waiting with keen anxiety the very first possible opportunity to hurl at the Democratic breast every javelin of criticism and invective that they possess. [Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen, I think this is about all I had in mind to say. [Laughter and applause.]

I want to say to the Democratic Members that this is a mighty happy time for us in the organization of the Seventy-second Congress.

> This is the way I long have sought
> And mourned because I found it not.

I came here in the Sixty-fifth Congress under the leadership of that great and grizzled old Jeffersonian Democrat,

Champ Clark. [Applause.] Some of you had the honor of serving under the great leaders of the Democratic Party further back than that. We are reminded of Randall and Carlisle and Crisp and Clark and the other great Democratic Speakers whose portraits hang out there in the hall. We Democrats who pass through there look up to their portraits with respect and reverence, and cherish the memory of their political leadership.

We have just exalted to this high position of great trust and responsibility a man who, in my opinion, will measure up to all of the honored precedents of that high station [applause], a man of long parliamentary experience, a man of sound judgment, a man of absolute fairness of decision, and, above all, an absolute Democrat in spirit and in purpose. [Applause.] I believe he is a man who, when he has finished the discharge of these duties, will rank in equal dignity and capacity with all of his brilliant predecessors. [Applause.]

I believe that under the leadership of this other grizzled old Democrat from Illinois, HENRY T. RAINEY [applause], who has had a long and arduous and honorable service of more than a quarter of a century, with the cooperation of his associates on this side, will make the Democratic Party as now organized in the House such an instrumentality of the American people for a resurgence of those principles of justice and equity and real consideration of the rights of the average man, as will win for us for years to come the confidence and support of the American people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The attention of the Chair has been called again to the fact that occupants of the gallery by applause are expressing their approval and disapproval of what is said in this Chamber. May I admonish them that when the House is in Committee of the Whole such expression of approval or disapproval is not sanctioned by the rules, and occupants of the gallery will refrain from such conduct in the future.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, in view of the announcement of the majority floor leader that the time until 4 o'clock would be devoted to a discussion of the President's message, I think before that time elapses we ought to have something said upon that subject, and I therefore yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, in addition to the matters usually coming before the Congress there will be unusual legislative proposals to meet the world-wide, somewhat recurrent, but unusual situation. These will demand the best judgment and patriotic devotion of every Member of this body in order that a proper solution of the difficulties may be found.

I am proceeding on the assumption that Members of this body will with whole-hearted devotion, irrespective of party alignment, endeavor to find such solution as will result in the best interest of the country and its people.

The President's message is a frank and succinct statement of the financial, industrial, agricultural, and economic conditions of this country. It states the favorable and adverse factors. It proposes well-considered and constructive measures for relief, reconstruction, and rehabilitation, in addition to activities heretofore undertaken by the President in cooperation with States, municipalities, and individuals to maintain employment and minimize any distress that may arise in this country in the world-wide depression. He has used every available agency now at his disposal. As an instance, $780,000,000 of Federal funds, a sum three times as large as that of 1928, will be expended in 1931 in public works in every part of the country. This speeding up of construction is intended to furnish employment to labor in this emergency. By conferences with private enterprise he has caused available work to be distributed among employees, so retaining larger numbers on pay rolls; cooperation with governors of States and county and municipal authorities has further maintained employment.

Relief has been provided through cooperation with the American Red Cross and other humanitarian agencies, as well as by State and local activity.

The nation-wide response to the plans of the President is a significant expression of the confidence of those in responsible positions in the soundness of such policies and the leadership of the President. He has dealt wisely with a situation that in less capable and experienced hands would have resulted in great disaster.

It may be said that the response to the President's message by the press of the country commends the wisdom and usefulness of the propositions he has submitted.

At this time I shall discuss only the nine propositions the President has submitted to the Congress, dealing with the present emergency. They form the basis for the necessary legislation.

DECREASE IN EXPENDITURES

The first proposition is a decrease in expenditures. Every appropriation which can be reduced without adversely affecting the service involved or causing injury to the public interest has been reduced and the total amount of retrenchment in the next fiscal year will be approximately $365,000,000.

It would not be fair to the taxpayers if they should be asked to pay additional revenue into the Treasury or purchase additional securities of the United States unless, on the other hand, the Federal Government was willing to reduce the expenditure of money wherever possible. People must pay the taxes, and should not be asked to pay more or additional money unless the public needs require the expenditure.

INCREASED TAXES

A corollary to this proposition is the increase of taxes. The deficit for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, is estimated at $2,123,000,000. This includes the statutory amount for public-debt retirement, and for the succeeding year $1,417,000,000. It is impossible to raise this amount of money by any increase in taxation. To raise so large a sum by taxation would dry up the sources of revenue. It would defer the economic recovery, increase unemployment, diminish trade, and in every way prove disadvantageous not only to the citizens of the country but to the Government itself.

The Treasury says:

If the public credit is to be maintained, there are certain basic principles that must be observed in the conduct of national finances. First, the sinking fund assigned to gradual retirement of the public debt must be maintained, and even when of necessity the public debt is increasing the regular sinking-fund appropriations must be accepted in the accounts of the Government as fixed charges against Federal revenues. Second, over a period of years revenues must be equal to expenditures. Deficiency in revenue for a time may be inevitable, owing to operation of the emergency conditions, but must not be allowed to continue. Observance of these principles in the conduct of our Federal finances requires, in addition to continued effort to reduce expenditures, a very substantial increase in the revenues through taxation. For 1932 a large deficit is inevitable and, notwithstanding such improvement in trade and industry as may be anticipated, addition to the public debt in the fiscal year 1933 can not be avoided without such additional taxation.

It is not easy for any people to determine to assume a large additional tax burden at a time when their resources are depleted through business depression, but in the long run they will best serve their own interests by doing whatever is required to maintain the finances of their Government on a sound basis. The history of many nations attests this conclusion.

It must not be forgotten that the very ability of the Government to borrow depends upon the conviction on the part of purchasers and holders of Government obligations that the proper relationship between expenditures and receipts will be maintained. I am confident that increased taxation, clearly necessitated by emergency conditions, will meet the supporting response of our citizens to the needs of the Government.

The increase of the revenues must be decisively undertaken, but the promptness with which full adjustment can wisely be effected is conditioned upon existing economic circumstances. The rate at which debt reduction has hitherto been effected still permits some leeway. Additional tax burdens should not be so great as to retard the business recovery upon which the restoration of the normal flow of revenue depends.

I recommend revenue increases so planned as to insure the attainment of three objectives—first, substantial reduction of the deficit for the fiscal year 1932; second, the provision of revenue adequate in 1933 to meet current expenditures, not including the sinking fund, thus bringing to an end in that year any further increase of the public debt; and, third, laying the basis for the expectation of a fully balanced budget for the fiscal year 1934. Until full balance is attained the observance of the sinking-fund provisions will not result in a corresponding reduction in the debt, but through this program the integrity of such provisions will have been maintained as a normal part of the financial operations and as a guaranty of good faith.

Our immediate concern is the fiscal year 1933, since that is the first full year the revenues of which can be affected by new tax measures. Bringing the increase in the public debt to a stop during that year in spite of existing difficulties will represent a very real accomplishment.

I believe the objectives which have been set forth can be attained by the adoption of a tax program based in the main upon giving up for the time being the principal tax reductions effected since the revenue act of 1924.

The proposed increase is distributed between individual income taxes, corporation taxes, and estate taxes and various others, using as a basis the revenue act of 1924. With that act most of the taxpayers of the country are familiar and know its operation, and to use that act as a base does not introduce new and unknown problems.

The normal tax in 1924 was 2 per cent on the first $4,000 of net income, 4 per cent on the second $4,000, and 6 per cent on the balance. That is a half per cent higher on the first $4,000 than in the present law, 1 per cent higher on the second $4,000, and 1 per cent higher on the balance. These increases are moderate. By reducing the exemptions to what they were in 1924, namely, $1,000 for a single person, $2,500 for a married person, there would be added to the tax rolls about 1,700,000 taxpayers. No persons having an income of less than $2,000 will pay any tax at all, and the person having an income of $3,000 will pay only $1.50 normal tax, if married and having one dependent. The result will be that 80 per cent of individual income taxes will be collected on the higher brackets. There will be some 3,600,000 Federal taxpayers in a Nation of 120,000,000 people under this proposal. Of this number, less than 300,000 will contribute 90 per cent of the taxes, because higher brackets on surtaxes are gradually increased to a maximum of 40 per cent.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I understand the gentleman to say that he is advocating possible legislation along the lines of the 1924 act.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is the Treasury proposal and that of the administration. I append to my remarks a statement and a table relating to the individual income taxes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is the proposal the gentleman is submitting his own suggestion, or is it the suggestion that we expect will be sent to us by the Treasury?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is the suggestion contained in the Budget message received this morning and in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is in the Budget message that we received this morning which we could not hear read owing to the confusion on the Democratic side?

Mr. HAWLEY. That I do not know.

Mr. SABATH. I think that statement is unfair. I don't think the minority wanted to hear it read.

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANLOVE. In other words in a terse phrase, the new proposal would place the burden of taxation practically in the same brackets on the higher incomes as in the law of 1924.

Mr. HAWLEY. It restores the normal tax of the 1924 act but increases the earned income reduction and reduces the exemption for married and single persons and leaves the low brackets of the surtax the same as they were in 1924.

Mr. MANLOVE. In other words a man who is married and has one dependent on an income of $3,000 will pay a less tax than he did in 1924?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; he would pay practically the same.

Mr. MANLOVE. I understood the gentleman to say that he would pay a dollar and a half.

Mr. HAWLEY. A married person with one dependent, having an income of $3,000, while he now pays no tax would pay $1.50.

When I was interrupted I was discussing how this tax will be borne. Ninety per cent of it will be borne by less than 300,000 people. That is, the greater burden will be placed on those who pay in the upper brackets, and are consequently more able to pay. The additional income taxes will amount to approximately $83,000,000 during the last half of this fiscal year, and $185,000,000 during the full fiscal year of 1933. Of this additional revenue approximately three-fifths will be derived from the incomes of $100,000, or more, and more than four-fifths from the incomes of $10,000 or over. That is, in the readjustment, taxes will be placed upon those most able to pay. It has been considered in the preparation of this proposal that the taxes should be so placed as not to interfere with the economic recovery, because upon business recovery depends the increase of tax collections in the future and the employment of labor. All of the proposed increases in taxes are to be limited to a period of two years.

The corporation tax is to be increased from 12 to 12½ per cent.

RELIEF OF FEDERAL LAND BANKS

The third proposal of the President is to take care of the farm loan situation through the Federal land banks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any recollection as to how much revenue will accrue from the revival of the rates in 1924?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is estimated that all of the proposed increases in taxation together, if made effective on January 1, 1932, would increase the revenues in the fiscal year of 1932 about $390,000,000, and in the fiscal year of 1933 about $920,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the President's message, it is the plan of the message to have the income tax raised so as to take care of current expenses of the Government during the fiscal year 1933, and not attempt to raise additional taxes to provide for the expenditures of 1932?

Mr. HAWLEY. Three hundred and ninety million dollars will be added to the revenue for the fiscal year 1932, and $920,000,000 for the year 1933. Other funds necessary will be supplied from the sales of securities. In the second year it is proposed to balance the Budget, with the exception of the statutory payment on the public debt. In the third year the Budget will be balanced, including the statutory payment on the public debt.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. In connection with what the gentleman from Wisconsin has inquired, is there not also expected a very large saving and economy in appropriations?

Mr. HAWLEY. I have already stated that the estimates propose reductions aggregating approximately $365,000,000.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. Does the President recommend that this increase in the income tax should be retroactive?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is to apply to the income of 1931, on which taxes will be paid in 1932.

Mr. SABATH. How do we propose to take care of the deficit that we are facing now?

Mr. HAWLEY. By additional taxes and sales of securities.

FEDERAL LAND BANKS

The farm-loan legislation authorized an advance of $60,000,000 to the land banks as their initial capital. This has all been returned to the Federal Treasury with the exception of about $1,000,000. In this emergency it is proposed to advance again from the Treasury not to exceed $100,000,000 in order that the policy of the land banks not to foreclose on property except as a last resort may be continued. It will restore the credit of the Federal land banking system and stabilize the market for these bonds. It will enable them to sell their own securities, and from the funds so obtained to make further loans under that system. This is urgently needed for the relief of agriculture.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. I will yield for a brief question.

Mr. BLANTON. What is proposed to be done about redeeming the farms which have already been sold and the farmers turned out of doors?

Mr. HAWLEY. I have not seen the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no relief proposed for them at all?

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the gentleman mean where the farmer defaulted in his payments?

Mr. BLANTON. Because of three years' continuous drought, something unprecedented, he could not pay his interest, and his farm might have been worth three times the loan, but the farm was sold and taken away from him and his children turned out of doors.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have no information as to what provision relating to that there may be in the bill. I prefer to make no statement until I know.

Mr. BLANTON. That is very important, is it not?

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield to the gentleman for a brief question.

Mr. SABATH. Is it proposed to raise $60,000,000 by the sale of bonds of the farm land banks? Is that the proposal?

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the gentleman refer to the proposed advance of $100,000,000?

Mr. SABATH. One hundred million dollars.

Mr. HAWLEY. Which is to be advanced to the land banks?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. That will be advanced from the Treasury as the first $60,000,000 was advanced, and repaid later.

Mr. SABATH. I felt in case they tried to sell bonds, which are now selling at 50 cents on the dollar, we would not be able to realize very much for them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] has expired.

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman what additional time he needs.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. HAWLEY. For a brief question.

Mr. ARENTZ. The gentleman said our land banks would continue their present policy. Has it been the policy in the gentleman's district for the land banks not to foreclose? It has not been the policy of the land bank in Berkeley, Calif.

Mr. HAWLEY. If there is no other solution of the problem, they must foreclose.

Mr. ARENTZ. I am glad to hear there are some districts where that policy is followed.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. HAWLEY. The fourth suggestion of the President is to take care of the credit situation through an emergency reconstruction finance corporation. If anyone were to describe the present situation in a short phrase, he might designate it a "credit crisis."

It is proposed to create a corporation with a capitalization of $500,000,000 under control of five persons, namely, the Secretary of the Treasury, the governor of the Federal reserve system, the farm loan commissioner, and two other persons to be appointed by the President.

It is framed on the general principle of the War Finance Corporation. That was chosen because it was a law with which we became familiar and its operations were known. Credits in the country have greatly diminished. At present the bank credits have been reduced, since the fall of 1929, by $5,000,000,000. There have been withdrawn from circulation by people who have placed their funds in safety deposit boxes $1,100,000,000, making a total in those two items alone of a reduction in the available credit of the country of over $6,000,000,000 since the fall of 1929.

This corporation will be able to provide credit and will create confidence. It will relieve that tension now existing among banks which must be able to meet the demands of depositors and which now do not feel justified in making further loans.

I know of going concerns, solvent, with good business and with orders on their desks, that could not get loans or credits. The Treasury is to be authorized to subscribe a reasonable capital and the corporation to sell its own debentures. It is to be liquidated at the end of two years. Its field of operations will include agriculture, industry, trade, and commerce.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will these be long-term credits or short-term credits?

Mr. HAWLEY. It would depend altogether on the character of the operation, I suppose.

HOME LOAN DISCOUNT BANKS

The fifth proposal of the President is to make possible a revival of the building industry by the establishment of home loan discount banks to take care of the growing population of the United States. We increase at the rate of about 1,000,000 persons a year, and by the time this can be put into operation our population will have increased 3,000,000. Marriages will have occurred and new homes will be required.

The building and loan associations and similar institutions have asked this cooperation on the part of the Government. A corporation will be created with a capital of $150,000,000, along the lines of the Federal farm loan system, a known system. You will note that all of the proposed legislation follows known systems wherever it is possible. It will strengthen building and loan associations, savings banks, and deposit banks engaged in extending credits to building operations.

Mr. SIROVICH. Does not that put the Government in competition with the banking interests?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is to be a companion and necessary addition to existing systems.

Mr. SIROVICH. But if we do that, and some other problem occurs, a man could say that the Government was going into competition with private business.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Government will advance this capital, or as much as may be needed, which will later be repaid. Just as the Federal farm loan system was taken over by that system and the Government reimbursed its money, so this will be taken over and the Government reimbursed. It will be a temporary advance in order to enable the construction of homes necessary to house our people.

Mr. SIROVICH. Let us assume there are losses by the Government in the operation of this bank. Will they take over the losses just the same?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is contemplated they will be successful in their operations.

DEPOSITS IN CLOSED BANKS

The sixth proposal of the President—and I must hasten over this somewhat—is to relieve the depositors in closed banks, in which there are over $1,500,000,000 of savings and commercial accounts of our people, and to return to depositors such proportion as the assets of each bank may warrant. Many of these banks, if given the opportunity, would pay out. The purpose also is to relieve distress in a multitude of families, stabilize values in many communities, and liberate working capital to thousands of concerns.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. For a short question.

Mr. SABATH. What is the recommendation? There is no recommendation as to how to bring that relief about.

Mr. HAWLEY. That bill is now in the course of preparation.

Mr. SABATH. I hope so.

FEDERAL RESERVE ELIGIBILITY

Mr. HAWLEY. The seventh proposal of the President is to strengthen the credit situation through Federal reserve eligibility. This is a very serious problem. While there are $7,000,000,000 of eligible paper in the country, it is largely concentrated in a small number of banks. The great body of it is held by a few banks. Many banks throughout the country have good business, adequate assets, and good credit, but the paper they have is not eligible for rediscount in the Federal reserve system. Consequently, when they get to a certain point they must refuse loans.

There are two methods by which relief can be provided—either in the law to carry a specific statement as to the kind of paper that may be eligible for rediscount by the Federal reserve banks, in addition to what is now eligible, or to give the Federal Reserve Board authority, under rules and regulations it may prepare, to describe the other characters of papers that may be subject to rediscount, especially in an emergency like this. That will enable the banks throughout the country to give to their clients the necessary credit.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. For a brief question.

Mr. STAFFORD. As most of the Federal reserve district banks throughout the country have opposed any change and extension of the basis for Federal reserve rediscount, because of the danger of inflation, is it not clear that the bankers to-day are fearful that there will be inflation if some of these proposals are inaugurated?

Mr. HAWLEY. My understanding is, as I read the President's message, a majority of the governors of the Federal reserve banks have approved it. Also, that all of the proposals in the message have been discussed by people throughout the country who have experience with them, and that it is the concensus of opinion that these are the proper measures for the solution of our present difficulties.

Mr. STAFFORD. In an issue of the New York Times last week there was summarized the position of each of the heads of the Federal reserve banks, and they almost unanimously opposed any further rediscount privileges for fear of inflation, and, in my opinion, that is the danger in some of these proposals.

BANKING LAWS

Mr. HAWLEY. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I have already cited the message of the President on this. The eighth proposal of the President is to protect the depositors by legislation through revision of banking laws, securing their savings and restoring confidence. The extent of bank failures indicates the necessity for improvements in the existing systems. Our people have a right to a sounder system of safeguarding their deposits.

The Banking and Currency Committee for some time has been considering this legislation and will undoubtedly at this session report upon the subject.

The Treasury Department favors the recommendation of the comptroller which suggests regional branch banking.

RAILROADS

The ninth and last suggestion relates to railroads. They are absolutely essential to our progress and prosperity. They are large employers of labor and purchasers of enormous quantities of materials and manufactured products. Railroad bonds are held by all the large corporations, especially the insurance companies, savings banks, benevolent and other trusts, and by thousands of individuals.

There are in this country about $50,000,000,000 of securities of all kinds outstanding, including those of the Federal Government. The Government securities are largest in amount. The second largest amount consists of the securities issued by State authority or political subdivisions of States, and the third largest amount is comprised of railroad securities, which constitute about 20 per cent of the entire outstanding securities, or some $10,000,000,000. The Union Pacific said in one of its folders not long ago that 56,000 people owned the Union Pacific.

Furthermore, the construction of roads by public authority, involving the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars on hard-surfaced roads, has been availed of by stages and trucks for transportation purposes. These acquire no rights of way, construct and maintain no tracks, and pay no taxes on any roadbed, and they have taken from the railroads a considerable proportion of their earnings, especially the earnings on articles which have great value in proportion to weight or space occupied.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House has been considering this question and, as I understand, reported legislation at the last Congress.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Consequently, regulation of competition so that these agencies that avail themselves of public improvements and pay no taxes on their roadbeds can not unfairly compete with the railroads is necessary. Many trains have been taken off of the railroads in the last two years, and many to the disadvantage of the patrons of the road. If the railroads can not get enough money to live on under present rates, they must either go into the hands of receivers, as a number of them have, or ask for increased rates. Any proper regulation is in the interest of the public in retaining the present rate and, possibly, securing a lower rate of transportation as business revives.

These are the nine proposals of the President. They are all constructive proposals. They have gone to the heart of this present difficulty. There is a general consensus of approval. The President has used his influence with every employer of labor not to reduce wages, not to discharge men, but to stagger their employment and give every man some employment out of that available. He has used every influence with those who have such matters in charge to secure better credits for business, to open a wider market, and to encourage the confidence of the people. If we can restore public confidence in our industrial securities and in our State and municipal securities the road to recovery is opened. I know of securities of States whose legislation is on a sound basis that ought to have sold on an interest basis of 4.20 that have been selling for 5.30 or more. The proposals the President has submitted to Congress are intended to restore the confidence of the country in its own affairs. They have long been under consideration. They have been submitted to men whose experience entitles their judgment to credit and approved by them as essential and workable. These express the mature judgment of a great Executive, whose interest is alone in the welfare of the people who called him to his high office.

Mr. Chairman, I submit this concluding statement. While I am a Republican, as you all know, I want to appeal to the membership of the House as Representatives of the United States that in this crisis we unite on the program suggested by the President, a program that will restore confidence, reemploy labor, rehabilitate business, and restore the country to normal conditions, and let the credit for such accomplishment fall where it may. The country awaits our action and hopes for speedy relief.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman think we can get a return of prosperity here in spite of this world-wide depression that the gentleman blames for everything that has happened?

Mr. HAWLEY. We can help ourselves, and by helping ourselves we will begin to help the rest of the world.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I object for the present so that the gentleman may make the request when we get back into the House, and then we can make it apply to all.

PROPOSED REVISION OF INDIVIDUAL INCOME-TAX RATES AND EXEMPTIONS

Mr. HAWLEY. Among other revenue proposals, the Treasury has recommended that, effective on incomes for 1931, individual income-tax rates and exemptions be revised to conform to the revenue act of 1924. Under the 1924 plan normal rates applicable to individual incomes would be fixed at 2, 4, and 6 per cent, instead of the present rates of 1½, 3, and 5 per cent; surtax rates would be graduated from 1 per cent on incomes in excess of $10,000 up to 37 per cent on incomes between $100,000 and $200,000, reaching 40 per cent on incomes in excess of $500,000, compared with present rates graduated from 1 per cent on incomes in excess of $10,000 up to 20 per cent on incomes in excess of $100,000. Personal exemptions would be fixed at $1,000 for single individuals and $2,500 for married individuals, compared with $1,500 and $3,500, respectively, under the existing law, the present credit of $400 for each dependent and the earned-income provisions of the revenue act now in effect remaining unchanged.

The effect of this proposed revision of the individual income-tax rates and exemptions is illustrated by the accompanying table, which shows the amount of tax which would be paid, under the present act and under the act as revised according to the Treasury's proposal, by a married individual with one dependent and by a single individual with no dependents, assuming various amounts of income.

Comparison of total individual income tax payable under the present law (1928 revenue act) and under proposed rates (1924 revenue act) by a married individual with one dependent and by a single individual without dependents

[It is assumed that all net income not in excess of $10,000 is earned and in addition one-half of the net income in excess of $10,000 until the statutory limit of $30,000 earned income is reached. It is also assumed that net income includes no dividends, no capital net gains or losses, and no interest on Government bonds]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the debate to-day has centered more or less around the message of the President, at least that has been the text taken for discussion, although at times the arguments have gone far afield. The time will come in this Congress when we will take up the suggestions of the President in a far more serious consideration and see what constructive proposals he has submitted in his message that can be used to help us out of this great depression and try to come back into former conditions.

I am well aware of the fact that under present circumstances if we should discuss the message from a political standpoint both sides would drift somewhat far afield.

So I think, in view of the statement of my colleagues, that these are matters which should be considered in a more serious vein, in view of the fact that if they were discussed from a political standpoint we would not reach any agreement, and that we ought to have the suggestions of someone else, I ask permission to read an editorial from the New York Times, a publication that has been cited on the floor of this House as one deeply interested in public affairs and the public welfare. Feeling that this record should be made, I therefore read the following editorial from the New York Times of December 9, entitled "Mr. Hoover's Message."

MR. HOOVER'S MESSAGE

One rises from reading the President's message to Congress yesterday with the feeling that it is in general correct but cold. Those who looked to Mr. Hoover at this national juncture for fervent and inspiring leadership will be disappointed. He had refused to summon the new Congress in extraordinary session because he feared that it would interfere with the orderly processes of recovery and upset the public equilibrium. This naturally led to the hope that he would have a program to submit which would at once appeal to the country, which he could unfold with fire and energy, and which would kindle popular enthusiasm. It can not truthfully be said that he has done this.

He has, indeed, applied to the pressing difficulties of the Nation his unusual powers of analysis, he has indicated the main lines which legislation should follow, has interposed in advance his personal negative to various plans that have been proposed, but has somehow managed to do it all without giving a stirring watchword or symbol for the people of the United States. This may be partly a matter of temperament with the President. It may be due largely to the complexity and variety of the problems which confront the Government. But the effect is, it must honestly be said, to leave Americans still longing for a public man who could rise to the great crisis in a great way and utter words which would not only be watchwords of debate in Congress, but which would carry cheer and hope into thousands of despondent homes throughout the country.

Admitting that we are passing through "distressful" times, the President is still inclined to lay the chief blame for them upon causes that are world-wide. Had we been allowed to go our own way undisturbed by foreign vicissitudes and misfortunes, the President's inference is that we should have been "enabled to recover long since but for the continued dislocations, shocks, and setbacks from abroad." He must be aware, however, that if he asked the economic and public authorities of "abroad" to diagnose existing world troubles they would unhesitatingly trace the origin of the mischief to the American mania and muddling of 1929. Mr. Hoover himself is in fairness forced to concede that "some of the causes of our depression are due to speculation, inflation of securities and real estate, unsound foreign investments, and mismanagement of financial institutions." But he is too much inclined to insist that we should now be quite well if other nations were not sick.

Passing this by as a matter of opinion now hardly worth debating, it is to be said that the President points out accurately what must be done to face and surmount our financial embarrassments, no matter what their origin. We must for some time live as a nation straitened by circumstances. There is nothing for our Government but the most severe and continuous economy. Public expenditures must be held down. Public revenues must be increased, and the only way to do so is by added and heavier taxation, in order to make front against the enormous deficit existing and impending, and so eventually to balance the National Budget. These are unpalatable and unpopular truths, but the President was in duty bound to set them forth, and he has done so with commendable determination. Ways and means, along with the necessary details, may be worked out later. But the main principle upon which Mr. Hoover insists is perfectly sound, absolutely vital to the right conduct of our public finance, and must be embodied in the legislation which Congress is called upon to enact.

From the various scattering recommendations which the President makes apart from the chief issue, prudent men will be disposed to withhold approval—at least until Mr. Hoover's suggestions or schemes are brought out of the vague into concrete terms. Some of his plans, such as the consolidation of various Federal bureaus and activities, may be entirely justified in theory, but to expect this Congress at this time to adopt them seems visionary. To ask too much, too confusingly, from Senators and Representatives is to endanger the little that is clear to their minds and that they ought to give without long delay. The President would have been better advised, we think, to have pushed these projects separately from time to time rather than to have thrown them all into the omnium gatherum of an annual message.

In his own way President Hoover has done his best to cheer the people up. He bids them hope. He expresses the utmost confidence in the recuperative powers and the future of the country. All this is well and timely. It is perhaps as much as we could have looked for or asked from Mr. Hoover. It would have required a personality more tingling with vitality than his, a tongue and pen better subdued to moving expression, to have given the American people to-day the sense of having a pillar of cloud and fire to lead them on day and night.

The President has not given the country the hope they anticipated he would give. He has not given them constructive proposals which Congress can follow with confidence. So I have read this fair analysis from one of the greatest periodicals in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if I could have time to read what I consider the fairest analysis of the President's message?

Mr. RAINEY. Could the gentleman read it in five minutes?

Mr. MANLOVE. I fear it would take more time than that.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman can read as much as he can and extend the balance in the RECORD.

Mr. SNELL. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MANLOVE].

Mr. MANLOVE. I will read what I consider a fair analysis of the President's message. I take great pleasure in presenting to the House the editorial which appeared in the Washington Post of December 9 under the heading "The Path to Prosperity." This article undoubtedly reflects the patriotic sentiment of the American people regardless of party affiliations:

THE PATH TO PROSPERITY

The tone and temper of President Hoover's message to Congress is admirable. With his usual skill in unraveling complex situations and condensing into brief sentences the pith of his unwearied studies, he presents to Congress and the people an understandable picture of the world depression, and offers relief recommendations which are so obviously sound and workable that Congress can not fail to approve them.

The aims of the President are the aims of the people. It is inconceivable that the national welfare will be sacrificed by politicians after the pathway to prosperity has been so clearly outlined and the desire to take this path is held by all the people.

Mr. Hoover's recommendations are not offhand "panaceas" concocted by an officeholder whose sole object is to be reelected. They are the composite result of hundreds of conferences and studies by the most competent men in the country, belonging to all parties, and molded for the single purpose of releasing the powers that already exist—powers not imagined or invented for this emergency, but inherent in the people and resources of the United States. These plans look to the removal of economic paralysis so that Americans can themselves go forward in the work of restoration of good times. No outside power can help them; their salvation is in themselves. No power can stop them when they once unleash their energies.

The several plans proposed by Mr. Hoover will be found in his message and need not be discussed in detail at this time. These plans are subject to alteration and amendment by Congress. Doubtless valuable suggestions will be forthcoming in committees and on the floor. What is desired above all other things by the public is that Congress shall resolve to cooperate with the President. With cooperation will come legislation that will expedite prosperity. Without cooperation there will be confusion and failure, with prolonged hardship to the people.

Moderation in appropriations and in levying taxes is necessary as a corollary of legislation designed to release credit and stimulate agriculture, commerce, and industry. No net good will be accomplished if Congress, while enacting emergency reconstruction legislation, should also make extravagant appropriations or impose crushing taxes. The Government must be made and kept sound and solvent, while steps are taken to help private enterprise.

If President Hoover had been playing politics with the economic situation, he would have dodged the duty of recommending additional taxation at this time. He faces the music and risks the unpopularity that is supposed to follow a proposal to add to the tax burden. He relies upon the common sense and moral courage of the people to support him when he discloses the facts concerning Federal finances. It is the people's Government, not his. He gives an account of his stewardship and offers well-considered plans for bettering the situation. Contrary to the assumption of timorous politicians, the people will not find fault with President Hoover for advocating increased taxation. They do not blame him for conditions that were not made by him nor made worse by him. They would blame him if he concealed the truth.

A glimpse of the appalling conditions outside the United States is given by the President, with the promise that he will discuss foreign affairs more fully in a later message. This résumé of foreign relations will be awaited with extraordinary interest, tinged with anxiety; but for the present the people have before them the domestic situation, accurately stated, with definite plans for the improvement of conditions. The first duty of economics, as of charity, is to begin at home. The recuperation of the United States is comparatively easy, provided the Government and people join hands in putting definite plans into effect. With the United States going forward in full vigor, every country in the world will take heart and work toward recovery.

Patriotism requires every man in Congress to support the President's recommendations unless, with pure conscience and with a will to cooperate, the legislator can propose alterations or improvements. Obstacles placed in the path of this proposed legislation for partisan reasons would be nothing less than an attempt to prolong the public misery.

(Mr. MANLOVE's time having expired before the full reading of the editorial, he asked unanimous consent to print the remainder in the RECORD.)

Mr. RAINEY. I will make that request after we get in the House.

Mr. SHANNON. Will the gentleman yield? Is that the newspaper of which Mr. Edward B. McLean is the editor and publisher?

Mr. MANLOVE. I will answer the gentleman by saying that this editorial represents and reflects the sentiment of a large majority of the people of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOZIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the President's message and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken to-day have permission to revise and extend the remarks which they made to-day in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who spoke to-day may have permission to revise and extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, it was understood in the committee that the gentleman from Missouri should have permission to finish the editorial he was reading.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. In that connection let me ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] if this editorial is from the same newspaper whose owner was the one who carried $100,000 in a little satchel to a distinguished member of a former President's Cabinet? Of course, if the gentleman is adopting that sort of editorial as the policy of the great Republican Party, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, we had an understanding on the floor that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MANLOVE] would be permitted to print the rest of the editorial he started to read in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to do that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WAR DEBTS AND REPARATIONS

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a speech delivered by myself on war debts and reparations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I present an address delivered by me before the Bethesda (Md.) Chamber of Commerce, Monday night, December 7, 1931, as follows:

From one extremity of this country to the other commerce and industry are stagnant, agriculture is prostrate, and business of all kinds, big and little, is disorganized; capital has suffered heavy losses, the wages of labor have been lowered, there is much unemployment, and suffering and want are widespread. These conditions have prevailed for more than two years.

Where should we look for the causes of this condition? The expert diagnosticians have combed the domestic field and although some for interested purposes have striven hard to prove the causes to be domestic they have failed to find anything which furnishes an adequate explanation.

We live in a rich and fertile land, possessing almost every natural resource; our population is intelligent and energetic; our laws allow the broadest possible initiative to energy and enterprise; we have suffered no epidemic of disease or prostrating disaster of nature; and we are not harassed by wars or the fear of war. For the maintenance of our national welfare we are peculiarly free from the need of dependence on the foreigner; we could live, and live well, solely on the proceeds of our own resources. What, then, has suddenly brought this industrial paralysis throughout the land?

A belated admission was made only a few weeks ago by one of our leading bankers who appeared before a congressional committee that we have loaned too much money abroad, and that this is a major cause of the industrial stagnation. So it is causes coming from without and not those arising from within that we must examine if we would understand what has happened and know how to guard against it in the future.

Most of the money which we have loaned abroad has been loaned in Europe. The practice began with the making of the vast war loans. It would have seemed that our lending should have ended there, as indeed our public lending did, for a time; that private lending would have been upon a strict business basis, limited by the capacity of the borrower to pay. As we know now, loans upon this basis would have been relatively small.

We had a depression in this country in 1921, which was due to the fact that payment of a very large trade balance due from Europe in gold was unduly delayed. It was eventually paid, raising our gold stock to $4,000,000,000 and restoring our domestic economy to a sound and healthy condition.

This was our situation in 1924, and there is no reason why the facilities of the Federal reserve system and of the banks of the country should not have been conserved thereafter for a vigorous internal development, which should have been the chief preoccupation of Government and become a national policy.

But after 1924 this sound policy was deliberately rejected by our State and Treasury Departments and by our great private bankers. They all cooperated in the creation in Europe of German war-reparation bonds, which they made negotiable, to the amount of $4,000,000,000, under what they called the Dawes plan, and the Federal Reserve Bank of New York devoted most of its energies to facilitating the desires of European borrowers, public and private, to monopolizing the resources of our Federal reserve system.

I have explained heretofore that there was a hitch in the plans to dispose of the Dawes-plan bonds in the United States and that none of them were sold here, and that the international bankers thereupon began a most energetic campaign of vending European municipal and industrial bonds of all kinds.

This put billions in ready cash into Europe and gave it an enormous and artificial purchasing power here, which created the apparently prosperous period here between 1925 and 1929. When they had spent all that they had borrowed and could get no more, the overstimulated producing market in America was without a customer, a glut of unsold goods in our domestic market followed, and our industrial life was thrown into the disorder which is with us yet.

Now, the simple explanation of all this is that we were making loans which it was not in the power of the borrower to pay back, and we are having the same experience that an imprudent private capitalist would have under the same circumstances.

In the light of these facts, a careful scrutiny of the Young plan would seem to be advisable. In so far as it provides what they call "conditional" annuities, which are merely annual payments by Germany to the allied states, it need not concern us. But it also provides what they call "unconditional" annuities, payments of $160,000,000 in cash which Germany must make under all circumstances. If that were all it, also, need not concern us. But that is not all. A bond issue is to be floated of $3,250,000,000 in negotiable gold-bearer bonds for the benefit of the allied states, and these unconditional annuities are to pay the coupons. Inasmuch as it was European bond issues totaling about $4,000,000,000, dumped in this country between 1925 and 1929 that has caused the present mischief, are we to face the same experience in the future when this $3,250,000,000 in Young-plan bonds is dumped here? Moreover, these are not commercial bonds; they are war-reparation bonds; they are treaty of Versailles bonds; and they have their origin in a swindle.

Immediately after the armistice the supreme war council drew down a curtain between the realities in Europe and all on this side of the Atlantic, and before that curtain they proceeded to enact a drama for the benefit of the trans-Atlantic audience, an elaborate pageant called "War Reparations," which purported to be authentic history and which was so accepted here.

Since then continuously they have presented other acts of the play, and these acts also have been witnessed from here and accepted as true and authentic.

The drama opened immediately after the armistice with a chorus which hailed the armistice agreement as marking the conquest and unconditional surrender of the enemy. We saw a victorious peace conference deliberating upon his fate. We heard the cry go up for just and condign retribution for his crimes. We heard the shrill recital of his treachery and his barbarous cruelty, and of his congenital incapacity for the observance of good faith; and we were told of the necessity of shackling him for generations so that his innocent and peace-loving neighbors might sleep in security at night. We saw the peace conference deliberating upon the confiscations and tribute to be imposed, and adopting the principle that the extreme maximum that could be exacted was less than the requirements of justice demanded.

And under the histrionic stimulus all this seemed just and right to us. Our President went to Paris, and we saw him moving across the center of the stage; we saw him with a noble gesture renounce all reparations on our account, and when he came home with the treaty which he had signed and recommended it to us, most of us accepted it as a reality.

So far as Germany was concerned, after watching the Paris drama for six months, we saw a ruthless enemy who had been fairly conquered in battle effectively and properly shackled. This met with our approval, and we practically dismissed Germany from our minds. Our fascinated eyes were fixed on the League of Nations, the most gorgeous spectacle of the peace-conference drama. It seemed to illumine the international stage like a rainbow after storm.

Some among us, however, feared that by entering the league, as it was constructed, we would be granting away too much of our sovereign power. We had given full faith and credit to the war settlement with the enemy, we harbored not the slightest distrust as to its honest character, but we were apprehensive that under this world charter of law we would be yielding too much. So the Senate did not ratify the treaty of Versailles, and in declining to ratify the treaty it incidentally declined to ratify the war settlement with Germany. This was a profound disappointment to the supreme war council.

But as the years passed, the supreme war council, not discouraged, continued to stage the elaborate drama of German reparations for the benefit of the trans-Atlantic audience. The second act was the London ultimatum of 1921 which created negotiable German reparation bonds in the sum of $33,000,000,000, belonging to the allied states, with a view to disposing of them chiefly in the United States. Most of the trans-Atlantic audience continued to look on interested and indeed, fascinated. The third act was the Ruhr invasion and the Dawes plan with its $4,000,000,000 in negotiable reparation bonds; and the fourth act was the Young plan with its $3,250,000,000 in similar bonds.

For one reason and another the sale of the negotiable reparation bonds in America could not be gotten under way, and so, after the second act, the supreme council began sending its ushers, the international bankers, through the trans-Atlantic audience, passing the hat, and leaving no section of the house uncombed. In this way, several billions of dollars were collected for which the ushers exchanged with the audience allied and German municipal and industrial bonds. This cash was needed to defray the expenses of the dramatic production.

As we meet here now, the ushers are offering to the audience the Young-plan reparation bonds (those for which the unconditional annuities are to furnish funds for payment of the coupons). There are about $91,000,000 now being distributed through the aisles, and as soon as the audience is in a more liberal mood than it is just at present, there are more than three thousand million dollars worth of them resting on the shelves of the Bank of France ready for distribution. France having furnished the greater part of the histrionic talent which has kept the trans-

Atlantic audience enthralled, the collections of the ushers to be derived from future sales of the Young-plan bonds are, therefore, to go almost exclusively to France.

As I have explained before, if the allied states can sell most of them here, we will have paid the German war indemnity to them in cash in exchange for the right to collect it in annual installments from Germany for the next half century.

When we have bought the bonds the play will be brought to an end, and the trans-Atlantic audience will be allowed to awaken from the spell; the curtain between them and reality which was lowered on November 11, 1918, will be raised again, and they will be permitted to gaze upon the stark realities which have been concealed from them for 13 years.

It is my purpose now to point to the realities which all along have lain behind the curtain. The armistice of November 11, 1918, did not mark the conquest and unconditional surrender of Germany. Germany was still capable of military resistance, and on November 11 had no thought of selling herself into slavery. On that date she had closed with President Wilson a preliminary treaty, definite and clearly understandable in its terms, and one in which the allied states had only too willingly joined in order that their very existence might be preserved.

Under that treaty Germany, besides the cession of certain territories, would have paid war reparations amounting in all to about $8,000,000,000. If the treaty had been honestly carried out in letter and spirit the reparations would have all been paid by this time and the war would be over in Europe. The drama for the benefit of the trans-Atlantic audience would not have been invented and there would be no reparation question to-day into the forefront of which America has been thrust.

But this honest settlement would not satisfy the swindlers of the supreme war council. They wanted somebody to pay them the costs of Europe's war; they wanted somebody to buy from them the right to collect an enormous war indemnity from Germany. And the first thing to do was to transform the peace terms into a conquest so that Germany could be exploited.

Under the military armistice terms Germany was giving up her means of defense, and in a few weeks was disarmed. It was possible now to overcome her by military pressure and to substitute the terms of conquest for those of the preliminary treaty. Some form of ruthless force was needed to break an unconquered nation, even though disarmed, and for this purpose there is no force so effective as the continued pressure of starvation.

So, simultaneously with the opening of the drama staged at Paris for the entertainment of the trans-Atlantic audience, the tragic and sordid reality of history took its course behind the curtain that hid it from the spectators. The systematic starvation of the German Nation began.

It is well to be specific about events of such magnitude. The necessary dispositions to effect the postarmistice conquest were taken at a secret three-day meeting of the supreme war council, which opened in London on December 1, 1918.

These dispositions placed Germany in the hands of Marshal Foch and the armistice commission on the Rhine; and the armistice commission, with the assistance of the blockade commission, was given its orders to effect a conquest of Germany.

The day after the meeting in London adjourned notice was given of general British elections to be held on December 14, and the coalition government (notwithstanding its agreement with Germany on November 4) promised the people that if reelected they would go to the peace conference demanding the last farthing that could be extracted from the Germans.

On the next day orders in council sent the English Navy into the Baltic with instructions to blockade the German Baltic coast, and this naval blockade was maintained throughout the period that the peace conference sat. It completed the military encirclement which Marshal Foch had instituted by land, and it excluded the importation of any food whatever into Germany until after the treaty of Versailles was signed six months later.

These measures were all taken and put into operation while President Wilson was on the Atlantic Ocean, and they were concealed from him after his arrival in Europe.

The President went to Europe to put into effect the peace terms already agreed upon. He was no party to this new development. Again, in matters of such historic magnitude, it is well to be specific.

Some of us here may recall what the President said on November 11, 1918, when he addressed both Houses. Informing the Congress of the signing of an armistice and the ending of the war, he said that the war had been ended in a spirit of friendship to the German people under their new democratic government, and that a policy of good will and aid to them would be followed; that the first manifestation of this friendly attitude was a comprehensive plan for food relief, in which the allied governments had signified their purpose to join, to be carried out in the same systematic manner in which the relief of Belgium had been organized. "Hunger does not breed reforms," said the President, "it breeds madness and all the ugly distempers that make an ordered life impossible. They are now face to face with their initial test; we must hold the light steady until they find themselves." The same spirit permeated the entire address.

And on November 12 a note from the State Department was transmitted to Mr. Hans Sulzer, minister of Switzerland, in charge of German interests in the United States, requesting him to transmit a communication to the German Government. The communication to the German Government was couched in the same terms as those which the President had used in addressing the Congress the day before, and assured the German Government that he was willing to consider favorably the supplying of foodstuffs to Germany and to take up the matter immediately with the allied governments.

So, as he stood here, there was no uncertainty or indecision in his purpose. But from the moment of landing in Europe on December 14 he found himself in an atmosphere which did not accord with his views. The first four weeks after the armistice had brought about a great change there. The spirit of vengeance blazed on every hand; the slightest suggestion of moderation toward the enemy was viewed as the act of a pro-German. The kahki election had just been held in England and the armistice agreement had been suppressed and forgotten in France. The supreme war council, now in full course upon its career of international perfidy, had done its work well among the peoples.

For a few weeks it let the President have his turn, knowing it was now safe to do so. He spoke in public addresses much in the way he had spoken to the Congress; he spoke of the great wave of moral force now running through the world, of the need of a people's peace, and of the need of the sense of brotherhood.

The official peace conference convened late in January, and in the meantime the supreme council's conquest of Germany by the slow pressure of a food blockade, carefully concealed from the President and the trans-Atlantic audience, was well under way.

The Reparation Commission of the peace conference was organized on February 3, 1919. Here, in the most profound secrecy, these clashing purposes met for a showdown.

Mr. John Foster Dulles, legal adviser to the American delegation, arose and announced that it was the American position that the agreement signed by the Allies with Germany on November 4, 1918, constituted a limitation upon the right to impose reparations or penalties, and in successive meetings he maintained that the limitation was clear and unmistakable.

On behalf of all the Allies, and in arguments in successive meetings, Lord Sumner, legal adviser for England, took the opposite view. Upon this momentous point the Reparation Commission was in deadlock when President Wilson sailed for the United States on February 14, to be absent from the peace conference until March 15.

It was the President's parting instruction that the American delegation should maintain its position. Again, let me be specific in order that there may be no doubt of our historic facts. On February 16, as Mr. Baruch himself has told us, the American delegation on the Reparation Commission sent a wireless message to the George Washington telling of the deadlock and asking for instructions. The President replied with unequivocal directions to them to maintain their position, and if necessary to make it public.

Besides the legal adviser, John Foster Dulles, the American members of the reparation commission were Bernard Baruch, Norman Davis, and Vance McCormick. Why did they ignore their instructions from the President? Why did they fail to make their position public, as he directed?

It is obvious that the President wished this announcement to come from them and not from himself, and that if the announcement had been made, he would have proclaimed it as the position of the United States. It may be, also, that in sailing for the United States, he wished to be in his own country, in contact with the Congress and public opinion here, when this vital issue arose.

But the American delegation on the Reparation Commission did not make their position public, nor did they adhere to it as time passed, as is evidenced by what the commission did. The signal failed to come from Paris, and something sealed the lips of the President while in the United States. What it was must, perhaps, be left to the psychologists.

Meanwhile, in Paris, the Reparation Commission began its work of estimating Germany's capacity to pay upon the principle that there was no limitation upon their right to impose penalties. Marshal Foch and the blockade commission continued to withhold food from Germany and to wrest from the German Government the successive concessions which were finally to be written into the treaty of Versailles.

The treaty had already taken form when the President arrived again in Paris, and the rushing tide of events was beyond his power to turn or stay. It appears that he clung desperately to the letter of his peace agreement with Germany—to the assertion that in accordance with it there must be only reparations and not punitive damages; and that to meet his wishes this was agreed to as a matter of form while the term "reparations" was made to cover everything that could be included in a conquest.

By the end of March the land-and-sea blockade of Germany was doing its work. The German Government asked upon what terms the blockade would be lifted and food supplied, and a conference was arranged at Brussels to fix these terms. Once more, as this is history, let us be specific.

The conference was convened at Brussels on March 23, 1919, and there Germany delivered up all the gold in the Reichsbank and all the negotiable securities which her people possessed, and accepted the obligation to pay reparations in an indefinite sum and for an indefinite future to be fixed by her conquerors.

In return she received a contract for the delivery in her ports of a fixed quantity of grain and foodstuffs per month for a definite number of months. Thomas Lamont and Norman Davis were the American members of this commission.

The Germans carried out the terms of this agreement, but the peace conference did not. There was fear that if food now reached Germany she might reject some of the terms agreed upon and those yet to be imposed. No food ships, therefore, were allowed to dock at German ports until after the treaty of Versailles was signed on June 28, 1919.

This, in brief, is the history of the making of the treaty of Versailles. That it is illegitimate under the law of nations in that it violates the preliminaries of peace is evident. It affords the only claim to legality that the London ultimatum, the Dawes plan, and the Young plan have, and its illegitimacy therefore taints these settlements also. It had as its motive the sale to the American people of the right to collect an illegally imposed war tribute.

Mr. Barney Baruch, in 1920, published his views upon the peace settlement, and explained that the treaty was made under the influence of blood-raw passions. He thought that under the circumstances it was as good a settlement as could have been obtained, and his American associates upon the Reparation Commission appear to have agreed with him.

It may be that the settlement was as good a one as could have been obtained in view of the fact that the American members of the Reparation Commission failed to make their position public. Speaking for the President they had declared that there was a limitation upon the right to impose reparations, and they had been directed by him to maintain this position and to make it public. What was it that palsied the tongues of these gentlemen, and why did they so readily fall away from the President at the most critical moment of his public career?

Our views of the war settlement need revision. I need but point to the London ultimatum, the Dawes plan, and the Young plan with their billions in negotiable German reparation bonds, not one of which was ever disposed of anywhere until, after the lapse of 10 years and a campaign of ceaseless intrigue on both sides of the Atlantic, a complacent administration at Washington has permitted them to reach their destination in Wall Street.

There are three profound betrayals which are the foundation of this war settlement—the betrayal of the enemy by the supreme war council after a preliminary treaty, the betrayal of President Wilson by his colleagues in the peace conference, and the betrayal of the American people by the allied governments, who sought to shift to American shoulders the cost of the war in Europe, notwithstanding the fact that America's military power had saved them from conquest by the enemy.

The classic annals of bad faith which darken the annals of human history pale into insignificance before the sinister spectacle of this wholesale repudiation of moral principle. Nations and monarchs have been betrayed before, as when Scipio betrayed Carthage and when Brutus betrayed Cæsar or when at Senlac the Saxon thanes came not to King Harold's muster; great figures of history have been undone by men whom they had the right to trust and benefactors have been destroyed by those whom they have saved; but the moral abasement of those who at one and the same time treacherously overcame the enemy, treacherously destroyed their own chosen leader, and treacherously plotted against the nation that had saved them from conquest is comparable only to that which 2,000 years ago betrayed the Leader with a kiss.

In this country the sordid history of these intrigues is identified with no political party. Under a Democratic administration an international financial power usurped the functions of the American delegation in the peace conference. Under the Republican administration which followed it, this same financial power intrenched itself in our State and Treasury Departments, and it has remained there ever since. Political leaders who serve this financial power are put forward as candidates for President. It is the part of patriotism for all of us to rid our parties of the dominance of this group and to retire them from leadership in American politics and in private American finance. We need leaders who are not in the service of foreign governments and of a foreign financial power; we need leaders who can comprehend the extent and scope of these foreign influences and who will deal with them from the standpoint of the interests of all the people.

The business before the Congress in the next few days will be the consideration of the Franco-American accord of last August. Its terms are not those of the moratorium proposed by President Hoover on June 20 last. They are as different from it as black is from white. The moratorium of June 20 proposed a postponement of payments on all war debts and reparations. The Franco-American accord was made expressly to save the Young plan by excluding the unconditional annuities from the operation of the moratorium.

In view of the origin, history, and nature of the commercialized reparation bonds, is it not an insult to the representatives of the American people to ask them to put their stamp of moral approval upon them? Are we by passing this measure to reverse our policy of 13 years and make the United States at last a party to Mr. Baruch's blood-raw peace?

Putting aside now the matter of German reparations and the moral and legal insufficiency of the European settlements based upon them, why should we grant a moratorium upon all allied debts? The proposal is too sweeping. If Great Britain desires such a moratorium, under the circumstances, we are justified in granting it. It would be a constructive measure. But gratuitously to offer a moratorium at this time upon the French debt is a measure of inexcusable folly, because there is no doubt whatever of the French capacity to pay.

If France refuses to enter a moratorium which includes the unconditional annuities, then let her take what course she chooses; but let her fight her own battles over them without leaning on the United States Government for support and assistance. The days are over for attempts at the integral execution of the blood-raw peace, and, without American support, this will quickly become evident in Europe. Let France awaken from her 13-year-old opium dream of selling to America for cash the right to collect the German reparations; and to signalize this awakening let her feed the three billions of negotiable Young-plan bonds into the same furnace in which a year ago the London ultimatum bonds were incinerated.

The monotonous reiteration through the years that the allied governments must first receive from Germany any moneys which they pay on account of their debts to the United States has no merit whatever. It is a part of the chorus of the reparations drama. The answer to it is the fixed and avowed position of the United States that there is no connection between German reparations and allied debts to the United States.

It is true, as a matter of fact, that for 13 years the allied governments have collected in reparations from Germany much more than they have paid annually to the United States. It is no less true that for the past seven years Germany has made these annual reparation payments out of money borrowed in the United States. Do the allied governments mean to tell us if America ceases to make loans to Germany and thereupon Germany ceases to pay reparations to the Allies that the allied governments will cease making annual payments upon their debts to the United States? Repudiation is the only name which could be given to such a policy.

When the European statesmen have divested themselves of the sickly dream of delivering a German slave state to America for a price of billions in cash, the motive and purpose involved in the conception of German reparations will fall to the ground, and the cancellation of German reparations will logically follow. It is a sine qua non to the first steps toward a reconstruction of Europe.

As to the allied debts to the United States, it has not been demonstrated that they can not pay these debts out of their own resources, for thus far they have not had to do so. The United States will remain a fair and just creditor. It is conceivable that in future years these governments, or some of them, may not be able to bear the weight of the debts, for the fortunes and resources of nations rise and fall. In that case the burden can be lightened or the debts canceled, but in our policy there should be no connection between them and the German reparations.

This Franco-American agreement, which Mr. Mellon and Mr. Edge negotiated at Paris last summer, ought not to be ratified. Its rejection will serve the salutary end of making it plain to the governments of Europe that in orienting their policies for 13 years upon the hope that America will pay for the war by buying the right to collect the German reparations they have been following a will-o'-the-wisp; it will suggest to them the advisability of freeing themselves from the reparations hallucination, and of readjusting their mutual financial relationships upon a basis of reality. And once for all it will free American public policy and American private finance from association with the guilty intrigue of 1919 and from the moral degradation of a nearer association with the blood-raw peace.

THE MACHINERY OF CONGRESS

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting speeches I delivered on Navy Day and on Armistice Day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert an address, in part, made by me at Duluth, Minn., on November 11, 1931, at the fourth annual banquet of E. Porter Alexander Post, No. 137, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States.

The address is as follows:

This is a day sacred to the memory of the men who lost their lives in the World War. Among our people the slogan while that war was in progress was "To make the world safe for democracy," we pay tribute to the manhood of America who under our flag made the supreme sacrifice for that ideal.

On this day we also celebrate the victory of peace 13 years ago, and honor the World War veterans who returned from the conflict. Ours is not a duty, but a privilege, to extend to these men the commendations and the gratitude of a grateful people for what they accomplished.

Unfortunately the happenings of the past 13 years have shown that the troubles of the world did not end with the signing of the armistice. The World War brought to America more problems than it ever solved. The treachery of diplomacy and the treaties made, instead of settling matters on a true and right basis, have brought distrust, jealousy, and a lack of understanding among the peoples of the earth. Instead of freeing us from international complications, diplomacy and international experts have dragged us more and more into international problems.

On this Armistice Day every country has a depression and an unemployment problem. Every country is burdened with debt. The problem of taxation likewise challenges consideration of every thinking person. Even the principles of constitutional government are being assailed and our economic and industrial system is attacked.

These are critical times. It is not trite to repeat that there is a patriotism of peace as well as of war and that the welfare of America depends upon your courageous and intelligent handling of the problems of government in the days through which we are passing. You, whose love of country and devotion to its Government has been tested in the World War, again face in these days an opportunity to render service of the highest order to your country.

In the discharge of these duties an intelligent understanding of the machinery of Congress will be of help to you. You ought to know how Congress and the individuals who compose it function, the duties they are expected to perform, and the methods employed in this body. I want to discuss this subject to-night.

It is popular to blame your Congressman for everything that goes wrong, and measures or developments that benefit the public are accepted as a matter of course. The Congress of the United States has its field of work and it has its limitations. There is a popular misconception that a Member of Congress can do everything. Loose thinking has led to many wrong impressions as to the legislative branch of the United States of America. Some people do not even know that there is a Senate and a House of Representatives, and that both bodies must act upon a legislative proposal before it becomes a law. Further, the executive branch of the Government can exercise a veto power upon any such proposal even after the Senate and the House have passed the same. After a law is passed, the third branch of government, the judiciary, can declare it unconstitutional.

I am still a new Member of the House of Representatives, just entering upon my second term. It is true that I was reelected last year, but a period of 13 months elapses before Congress is in session following an election, unless there is a special session. Under our present constitutional provisions a Member serves through a session even after he has been defeated. This gives rise to the phrase "lame-duck" session of Congress. A constitutional amendment has been proposed to change this situation. It is the so-called "lame duck" amendment which came before us for a vote in the Seventy-first Congress. I voted for this amendment in the House. It was defeated due to a disagreement between the Senate and the House as to the wording of the amendment.

"Lame ducks" serve only in the short session. A new House is elected every two years, in November, on even-numbered years. The Members thus elected do not serve in the December session of that year. Their terms of office do not commence until the 4th of March following, when the old Congress automatically comes to an end. This is known as the short session. The new Congress convenes in the following December for the long session and can continue in session, if it desires, until the next December, when the next short session begins. Congress meets annually on the first Monday of December each year.

But I want to discuss briefly the machinery of Congress as I found it during the short time that I have served in the House of Representatives. I had to learn the methods of procedure. So I spent two weeks studying the work of the old Congress before I became a Member of that body. The House is commonly referred to as Congress, and in this discussion will have that meaning.

Let me say at the outset that we have a party system of government in the United States, and it functions in Congress. This simple fact is overlooked by many people. The political party with a majority of the votes organizes the House. That party selects a Speaker, a Clerk of the House, and other officers. It selects the chairman of every committee and puts a majority of its own members on each committee. For example, if there are 21 members on a committee the party in power will have 12 members on that committee and the minority party will have 9 members thereon.

I learned that the rule of seniority prevailed and that a new Member started at the bottom of the ladder. Members are assigned a room or office. But Congressmen older in point of service have a preference or first choice as to the office they will occupy. The new Member takes what is left. When it comes to membership on a committee, the new Member's name goes to the bottom of the list. The Member of the major political party who has served longer than anyone else has a preference for the position of chairman when there is a vacancy in the chairmanship on the committee. I found that a new Member could not even designate the committee on which he desired to serve. That was done for him by a committee on committees. Fortunately, I was assigned to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and was a member thereof during the Seventy-first Congress. Of course, there were other committees in which I was interested. But that consideration was of minor importance.

I talked to one of the veteran Members of the House about a committee assignment. He had seen 18 years of service in that body. He told an interesting story of his first experience in Congress. At that time the Speaker selected the committees. My friend was asked to designate the committees on which he wanted to be placed. He did so. He was then asked to name the committees on which he would refuse to serve. He did so, and said that under no circumstances would he work on those committees. When the appointment was made, to his surprise he received committee appointments he had indicated he would refuse to take. But he swallowed his disappointment, changed his mind, and accepted. To-day he is chairman of one of the leading committees of the House. Of course, the Members of the minority political party are assigned to membership on the various committees, and that is done by the House upon designation by their party leaders.

It is easy to talk about passing a law in Congress. Talk is always cheap. A Member introduces a bill, and this privilege is unrestricted. That bill is then referred by the Speaker to its proper committee. Then the difficulties begin. The chairman is a rather important person. He determines when committee meetings shall be held. Perhaps he does not want to call a meeting. What are you going to do about it? If he does call a committee meeting, perhaps there are other bills he wants to consider. What are you going to do about it? If he does decide to have a hearing on your bill, testimony must be offered before the committee. "Hearings" are held. The committee membership is composed of persons from all sections of the United States. They represent different viewpoints. Unless the measure is in response to a national demand, it may receive indifferent consideration. If it involves the expenditure of money other than for the governmental departments, then opposition is sure to come.

But suppose the committee acts favorably on the bill and recommends its passage. It then goes to the Union Calendar or the House Calendar. There it stays. Under the House methods of doing business neither of these calendars are ever reached. There is a Consent Calendar and a Private Calendar, and methods are provided for transferring bills thereto. Bills are considered on these calendars, but one objection will remove them, and they go back to the Union or House Calendar.

I said to one of my friends, after watching the House sessions for some time, "When do you work on the bills on the Union or House Calendar?" He smiled and answered that the House was so busy with appropriation bills, conference reports, and other privileged matters that it never found time to consider those calendars; that unless a committee chairman would call up a bill on "committee day," which comes once or twice a session, or unless unanimous consent were obtained, or unless the Speaker would put a motion to suspend the rules, then it was necessary to get a "rule." A rule, I was informed, was a resolution brought in by the Rules Committee providing that on a day certain a designated bill would come up for debate and a vote. "Then," I said, "if the Rules Committee turns you down, you are where you started?" My friend advised me that my conclusions were correct.

I saw an example of this the next day, when a Member of the House rushed to a member of the Rules Committee and excitedly asked for a hearing before the committee on a resolution that had passed the Senate and was pending on the House Calendar. He wanted a "rule." Three times he demanded a hearing and twice was told that the committee would consider the matter. In response to his third insistent demand for a definite date he received this reply: "You are finding out now, are you not?" That ended the case.

These methods of procedure may appear drastic, but it is important to note that they are practically the same, regardless of which political party is in control. The party that is in control of the executive branch of our Government, if it also has a majority of the Members of Congress, shapes the policy of Congress. I know the theory that the legislative branch of government is independent of the executive branch of government, and that one does not interfere with the other. But that, under our party system of government, is only a theory. There is an absolute interlocking between the two, and the party leader in Executive Office directs and controls. The Sepaker, the majority leader, and the chairmen of all committees are carefully selected because of their party affiliations. Their records are checked. Each must be a "good, safe, old hoss," from the party standpoint. Otherwise he does not occupy the position. Regardless of which party is in control this is true. So if the administration wants a bill passed, and is in control in the House, one of its leaders in Congress introduces the measure. It goes to a committee. The chairman promptly calls a meeting and the matter is heard at once and acted on favorably. It goes on the calendar. The Rules Committee brings in a "rule" and the measure is brought to a vote.

The real work, so far as the law-making feature is concerned, is done by Congress, through its committees. Unfavorable action by a committee means the death of any bill. Members of a committee will spend day after day listening to testimony. These hearings are usually held in the forenoon, and sometimes in the evening. The House goes into session at 12 o'clock noon each day, and continues throughout the afternoon. Sometimes night sessions are held. The program for these sessions is laid down by the party leaders. The membership are informed as to the business of the day. They know that other matters can not and will not be considered. For this reason Members sometimes absent themselves from the House floor while the House is in session. To persons unacquainted with the procedure, this appears to be a neglect of duty. Such is not the case. The voting on legislative matters is but a small part of the duties of a Congressman. When a Member is not on the floor, he is busy elsewhere. The "party whip" notifies his office when he is needed, and when a roll call is reached, electric bells are sounded throughout the Capitol and the House Office Building. The Members do not ignore these calls.

It is interesting to note that during the Seventy-first Congress, there was introduced in the House a total of 18,356 bills and resolutions, but the total number of laws and resolutions passed by both bodies was only 1,524. There were 46 standing committees of the House. A mention of some of them and their duties is proper. There is the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, which handles all legislation relating to the Post Office Department; the Committee on Agriculture, which passes on all bills relating to agriculture; the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which considers all bills relating to transportation and railroads; the Committee on Banking and Currency, which handles proposed legislation relating to banking; the Committee on Pensions, which passes on all pension claims; and the Appropriations Committee, which passes on all expenditures of money for the departments of Government. With the dozens of departments, bureaus, and commissions, under the executive branch of government, I think it fair to say that the major part of the time of Congress is occupied with bills appropriating money for their expenses and activities. When Congress is criticized for its extravagance, you can make up your mind that it has been voting money to run the various departments, bureaus, and commissions operated largely by the executive branch of the Government. The way to stop these expenditures is to decrease the functions of government and abolish some departments and bureaus.

A discussion on the legislative side of a Congressman's life opens up a wide field. Some people say we have too many laws, while, on the other hand, groups and individuals bombard their Representative for a horde of new laws. It is a case right from the start where you can not please everybody. But this is not the main difficulty. Clubs, cliques, lobbies, and loyal citizens fire away in your direction with letters and resolutions indorsing some pending bill and demanding pledges of support. Of course, these communications can be answered; but again the main difficulty presents itself. The bill, which looks so impressive in print, may never be considered by the committee. Then, there is the question of finding time to read all bills introduced in the Congress. I doubt if any Congressman actually read the 18,000 bills and resolutions introduced in the Seventy-first Congress. But that is not all. Suppose the committee considers the bill. It may change it, amend it, and make out of it an entirely different piece of legislation. If and when it reaches the House, that body may also do the same thing. The Member who wrote letters to all inquiries and who made many promises may not have before him for a vote the bill they were talking about at all. It may bear the same title and number, but the kitten may have become a wild cat or an animal with an odor not pleasing to the sense of smell. A vote against it after a promise to support the bill means more letters of explanation than there are grains of sand on the seashore.

With the increase in governmental activities and corresponding additions to Government departments and bureaus the demand for service from the people of the district correspondingly increases. Every new governmental regulation means new difficulties for our people and more work for a Congressman. Letters by the dozen come to the office every day. They must be answered. Assistance must be rendered. Land-office matters, veterans' claims, pensions, Indian problems, parole matters, applications to Civil Service Commission, inquiries regarding legislation, requests for publications, and many other subjects are handled daily.

One of the many, and perhaps the most unique, cases I handled was that of a constituent who wanted me to locate his brother who was last heard from in Chicago some 10 years ago. I scratched my head when that inquiry came, but promised to do my best. I finally decided to call on the Post Office Department for help. That branch of our Government, with characteristic efficiency, located the brother's last-known address, and advised me when and where he died. I was happy to advise my constituent. But that did not settle the matter. My constituent then wanted to know the address of the widow. Again the Post Office Department was able to furnish the information.

It takes time to handle these problems. Daily trips to the Government bureaus must be made. One day you may be checking up on a pension claim. The next day you may be getting maps from the Land Office for use in court proceedings for some one in the district, or you may be requested to see the immigration authorities on some case of vital concern to relatives you represent. If your Member is not on the floor of the House, you can make up your mind he is doing your work elsewhere.

Of course, not all requests can be handled satisfactorily. We can not set aside the law. We can not do the impossible. Well-meaning people sometimes make such requests. Their dissatisfaction is usually as great as the failure to obtain results.

Then there is another class of cases where a Congressman can not be of service. I remember about a year ago I was asked to have a contract to operate a school bus taken away from one party and given to another. The matter, of course, rested in the jurisdiction of the school board, and I had no more to do with it than I have jurisdiction over the Rocky Mountains. Still another constituent wanted me to have a township build a road for him, and another complained about the county tax rate. Neither of these problems were congressional at all. Both parties, of course, were disgusted because I did not wave a magic wand. There is recompense, however, in appreciation that occasionally comes from those who know when faithful service has been rendered.

I quote, in part, an editorial from the Itasca County Independent for October 29, 1931:

"Most people are under the impression that when Congress adjourns, the Members have nothing to do till the next session. This may have been the situation 20 years ago, but times have changed.

"Our own Congressman, WILLIAM A. PITTENGER, has been on the job in his district ever since last March. He * * * came back home, where he has been attending to the work of the district. He has not overlooked Itasca County, either. During the summer his office has handled important matters with Washington, which mean much to this section.

"Contract has just been let for the construction of a new bridge over the Mississippi River on Trunk Highway No. 35, and this means more work for our people. It was Congressman PITTENGER who took up the case with the War Department engineers at Washington and secured their consent to the proposed improvement Otherwise the project would have been postponed till next year.

"With the increase in the number of bureaus and commissions and departments of the Government at Washington, the work of a Congressman has correspondingly increased. The work for his constituents has become a major part of the congressional duties. Our Congressman, during his first term, selected competent secretaries, and his record of service entitled him to the large majority he received last fall, when he was reelected for a second term. * * *

"He will return to Washington in December to begin his second term in Congress, and we look forward with confidence to the same energetic and faithful service he has rendered during his first term."

OUR COUNTRY'S NAVY

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert a radio talk made by me over WEBC at Duluth, Minn., on October 27, 1931, under the auspices of the Naval Reserve of my district.

The talk is as follows:

I wish to thank Lieutenant Commander Mills and the Naval Reserve of this district for their very gracious invitation and the privilege they have extended me to talk to you on Navy Day. The observance of Navy Day had its origin in 1922, and annually since that date the American people have held appropriate exercises for the purpose of honoring the United States Navy, its men and its officers, and to-day we again pay our respects to this institution, recount and enumerate its past glories, its present worth, and its value to the future. The American Navy, rich in tradition, stands unsullied as a great arm of our National Government and ready to render service in the years to come for this Republic.

This occasion is also the birthday of the late President Roosevelt, and the date was selected because that great American never let an opportunity pass to pay homage to the naval forces of our country. Throughout his life he recognized the needs and the responsibilities of America, and for that reason was never backward in insisting that the power of the Navy should measure up to those needs and those responsibilities. He saw clearly that in time of peace, or in time of war, the Navy was a necessary and indispensable agency of the United States. He, it was, who preached the gospel that in time of peace, a strong navy, one able to command the respect of foreign countries, was the surest safeguard for peace and that in time of war an adequate Navy was necessary for our own defense. And so, we pay tribute to the memory of Theodore Roosevelt, his courage, his patriotism, and his Americanism.

There are many unusual circumstances which face us on this observance of Navy Day. The whole world is involved in a period of depression and unemployment. Our Treasury Department at Washington faces a huge deficit. Across the horizon of the world, beginning with the League of Nations, is the picture of disarmament and a world at peace, in which the swords and weapons of war are hammered into plowshares. The nations of the world have seemed to make friendly gestures in this direction, and have encouraged the idea that enormous armies and huge navies are a needless expense. Such a position is sound, if properly qualified. In 1922 the principal nations made a treaty limiting the number of war vessels they would build. In 1930 another treaty was consummated along the same lines. Plans are now being made for another disarmament conference at Geneva in 1932.

Now, a navy costs money. War vessels are not built by magic, equipped by chance, or maintained with proper men and officers by merely saying that virtue is its own reward. Any naval program means appropriations by and an expense to the Government.

Consequently, we have well-meaning people who see in this world-wide finncial crisis, in the Government's decreased revenue, and in the movement for world peace and disarmament every reason to urge the junking of the Navy or at least a suspension of its activities. Already programs are on foot for drastic changes in our naval policy in the coming session of Congress in December. Some advocate the closing of the navy yards and the suspension of naval construction. I do not undertake to-night to discuss these matters in detail, and time will not permit some proper comment concerning those individuals whose only interest in an adequate Navy is measured by the financial returns they expect to derive as a result of a naval program.

I want, however, to direct some remarks concerning this controversy from the standpoint of the men who are in naval service, who know its problems, its place in governmental affairs, and its need in the years ahead of us. We have here in this eighth congressional district a branch of the Navy Department. It is the Naval Reserve, the men are now active in its work. I think I understand their viewpoint and I think it is sound and patriotic

We must not overlook the fact that disarmament and reduction in naval expenditure can only take place by agreement of the great powers of the world. Unless and until other governments in good faith agree to disarm we have just two choices of procedure. Either we can continue to recognize the need of a navy and make proper provision for the same or else we can set the so-called glorious example of discontinuing our naval policy regardless of what other countries may do. As a matter of fact, in 1922 our Government did seek to set a good example for other nations in scrapping some of its vessels and in discontinuing construction work, but the war preparations in Europe have continued just the same.

So I say to those who, in their enthusiasm, would do away with the Navy or a naval program, that they overlook important facts. Other countries have not yet joined the United States in any such movement, however desirable. So far no country has overlooked the importance of its navy. The nations have only agreed to slow up in the race for naval power. This step is important and is a wonderful achievement. But it falls far short of any suggestion that the time has come to discard our Navy.

It is true that a great war was fought to make the world safe for democracy. But, unfortunately, the dream has not come true. Following that war the countries across the water have continued their warlike preparations, and the dove of peace does not hover over them. We hope, of course, that world agencies—the League of Nations, the World Court, and so forth—will be able to stem the tide. No one wants to see another catastrophe. We wish for the success of disarmament plans, but must not forget that other nations still have their navies. We can not disarm until others are willing to walk hand in hand in the peaceful valleys of concord and unity.

I do not want to be controversial in discussing this subject to-night. The horrors of war and the virtues of peace admit of no argument to the contrary. I said two years ago in an Armistice Day address that "if out of the World War, with its hardships, its hatreds, and its horrors, its toll of human life, and its aftermath of broken men, its sorrow and its misery and its ruin, there can come a better understanding among the nations of the world; if out of this there will come new institutions where nations can and will settle their disputes without resort to the sword, then that war has not been fought in vain."

But I did not then believe, and do not now believe, in the vicious philosophy of peace at any price. Until other nations agree to lay down the sword this country has only one alternative. National preparedness is a sound and compelling doctrine. I believe in the philosophy of Theodore Roosevelt.

In this connection I repeat his words:

"The United States Navy is the best guaranty the Nation has that its honor and interest will not be neglected; and in addition it offers by far the best insurance for peace that can by human ingenuity be devised."

During his administration one dramatic incident occurred. There was trouble in Venezuela. A long time ago President Monroe had announced to the world that foreign countries would not be allowed to interfere with the affairs on the continents of North or South America. His pronouncement became known as the Monroe doctrine. When Mr. Roosevelt was President this doctrine was put to the test. The German Government became involved with the Government of Venezuela and sent its naval vessels there and proceeded to seize its ports and territory. The British Navy also showed up on the scene of activities to lend encouragement to the German policy. Mr. Roosevelt called attention to the Monroe doctrine and protested the steps that had been taken. He wanted the naval vessels of foreign powers sent away from Venezuela. His protests were ignored. Finally he advised the German ambassador that no more protests would be made and that unless the foreign war vessels left South America he would send the American Navy there to carry out his commands. He meant business. This country had a navy, and the foreign war vessels left the harbor.

The Navy belongs to the American people. It is yours. Its officers and men have come from your homes. It is for you to say whether we will keep it and support it or whether we will cast it into the discard. If war should again come to a troubled world, it stands to guard and defend you. In times of peace it is a sure protection for our citizens wherever they may be. It commands the respect of other powers, because it is able to enforce its demands. It needs and it merits your support, your encouragement, and your good will. It has never failed you in the time of need, and it never will. Ponder well your course of action when its problems are presented to you for consideration and decision.

There has been much loose thinking about the problems of America following the World War. The gospel was preached that we were a world power, and that responsibility in world affairs rested on the United States. The world became our home, and to do good to others our highest aim. We were to become "international minded." We were to grasp the new viewpoint—the international one. The concerns of others were to become ours, and the gigantic task of saving humanity was to rest on the shoulders of America. I think it high time that we reexamined some of these doctrines.

In harmony with this new viewpoint, following the World War, it was suggested that our international financiers should tackle the financial problems of the world and that experts, economic and otherwise, should usurp the functions of Congress and relieve us all of responsibility. This was done. They shaped the treaty of Versailles. They shaped the Dawes plan of 1924 and the Young plan of 1929. The international financiers were to make the world safe, happy, and prosperous. What has actually happened? We have been led into the mire and the quicksand of European problems. We have departed from the old landmarks of Washington's Farewell Address, the Monroe doctrine, and every other policy that has made our country a bulwark of freedom in the past. Our international viewpoint and course of action has led to nothing but trouble.

I think it about time that we began to preach a new doctrine, the doctrine of "Americanism." I think it time that we again develop an American viewpoint. Our own people are entitled to consideration. We had better begin to look at world affairs from the standpoint of what is good or what is bad for America and not from the standpoint of the international financiers. There has been too much of the latter and not enough of the former standpoint. While settling the problems of the Old World, let us not forget our own. Watch well the world patriots who serve their own selfish ends at the expense of our people here.

In the years to come you will face this situation. It will have to be settled in Congress. It will be no easy task. The paid propagandist will be on hand with his many disguises. Those of our citizens whose interests lie in foreign lands are numerous and powerful. They will be active. But I believe we are beginning to realize that they have had their day. A new viewpoint, an American viewpoint, will be developed. The problems of this country and the welfare of our own citizens will then govern and guide our course of action and the troubles of our day will disappear.

FORMER REPRESENTATIVE WILLIAM LEIGHTON CARSS

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep regret that I announce the death of a former Member of this House, Hon. William Leighton Carss, who passed away at his home at Duluth, Minn., on May 31, 1931. Mr. Carss was my predecessor in Congress from the eighth district of Minnesota. He represented this district for three terms, serving in the Sixty-sixth, Sixty-ninth, and Seventieth Congresses. He was born February 15, 1865, at Pella, Marion County, Iowa, and moved with his parents at the age of 2 years to Des Moines, Iowa. He was educated in the public schools of that city. He studied civil engineering, and followed that profession for a number of years. He moved to St. Louis County, Minn., in 1893, and was engaged as a locomotive engineer on the Duluth, Missabe & Northern Railway when elected to Congress in 1918.

Mr. Carss was an outstanding member of the Farmer-Labor Party in Minnesota. He was a member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and at various times held important offices in that organization. Mr. Carss was a man of great personal popularity, and his death is mourned by thousands of his friends throughout the State of Minnesota.

SENATE

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1931

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, from whom all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works do proceed, grant to us all an utter consecration of body, mind, and spirit to the work whereunto Thou hast called us. Vouchsafe to these Thy servants the profound and poignant insight of true seers as they face these pressing problems with their changing tangled worth. Bestow upon our Nation a nobler spirit of devotion to the high ideals of government enshrined in this Republic, that with one heart and mind we may strive to do Thy will. Lead us to the Savior, who at this hour hung upon the cross, that we may find in Him the joy that can dwell with sorrow, the light that shines in darkness, the music that is born of pain. All of which we ask in His name and for His sake. Amen.

MARKETING POLICY OF THE NATIONAL GRANGE

Mr. CAPPER presented resolutions adopted by the Sixty-fifth Annual Session of the National Grange at Madison, Wis., which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by Sixty-fifth Annual Session of National Grange, Madison, Wis., November 20, 1931

Whereas the National Grange as far back as 1924 recommended legislation and prepared bills which were introduced into Congress containing many provisions similar to those of the present agricultural marketing act; and

Whereas the Federal Farm Board has been engaged in pioneer efforts to serve agriculture and the national welfare under this act:

Resolved, That—

1. The National Grange will continue to guard zealously the cooperative features of the agricultural marketing act from the attacks that are being made upon it by its foes and those who have not yet understood and entered sympathetically into the meaning of cooperative marketing to rural America and the national welfare.

2. The nation-wide cooperative marketing machinery, which has been expanded and developed during the two years under the agricultural marketing act as never before in any equal period of American experience, must be further extended and strengthened. More attention to building from the bottom up and to farmer control are essential to this development.

3. The agricultural marketing act should be amended at the coming session of Congress so as to provide for three important features:

a. There should be substituted for the stabilization operations the plan of the export debenture and/or such other methods of bringing our exportable crops and livestock products under the protective system as can be developed on a sound legal and economic basis. (No. 44, amendment to marketing act, by A. S. Goss.)

b. Provision should be made for advisory service on broader economic lines to supplement and strengthen the commodity advisory committee service and give the board the benefit of the views of outside economists.

c. Loans to cooperative farm supply associations should be authorized and the loan policies otherwise improved to meet the need for a sound cooperative loan service. In many cases small associations constitute as sound a basis for Farm Board loans as larger associations. (No. 66, financial aid for grower groups, by George Sehlmeyer.)

4. The Federal Farm Board, handicapped by a measure inadequate to meet the needs of a difficult situation, has nevertheless contributed greatly toward developing and strengthening the cooperative movement, and so long as continuing to serve these ends with fidelity and efficiency deserves the support of American agriculture and the entire public. Above adopted.

Whereas the Bureau of Agricultural Economics and other branches of the United States Department of Agriculture have been rendering service of a high order:

Resolved, That—

1. The economic work of the United States Department of Agriculture be given ample support in its efforts to render adequate and unbiased service in the marketing of farm products and in making available to farmers all pertinent information helpful in enabling them to estimate the prospective market for their products.

2. The development of uniform Federal and State grades for farm products be continued and their use facilitated by Federal and State laws as rapidly as possible. Above adopted.

Whereas the Bureau of the Census, United States Department of Commerce, has collected information having importance in the development of better marketing service for farmers:

Resolved that—

1. Crop and livestock information now tabulated by minor civil divisions by the census of agriculture be published as soon as practicable.

2. Information collected by the census of distribution be published in sufficient fullness to afford adequate knowledge of marketing as it affects the farmer and his community. Above adopted.

Whereas State and municipal action has served to encourage direct market dealings between producers and consumers so as to be helpful to all parties concerned in many instances:

Resolved, That adequate information as to the conditions essential to success in such arrangements be disseminated by appropriate agencies. Adopted.

Recognizing the mutual interests of the various organizations and the necessity for united action in the promotion of rural welfare, we recommend that the national master invite the various nation-wide agricultural groups to meet in council for the purpose of mutual assistance and concerted effort in promoting those programs and agencies in which they have a common interest. Adopted.

Monetary Stabilization

The deflation of the past three years has injured farmers more than any other class of producers in the country. While the average of all wholesale prices has fallen 30 per cent, the average of prices of farm products has fallen 45 per cent. This means that the burden of debts, most of which were contracted more than three years ago, and of which there is estimated to be $11,000,000,000 secured by farm mortgages, has increased 80 per cent in terms of the products which farmers sell.

In view of this serious situation, we urge upon the Federal reserve system and the Federal Government to take all steps possible to secure (1) restoration as nearly as may be of the wholesale price average as computed by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics to the level prevailing in 1926, or the average of 1923–1928, and (2) the stabilization of the price level as nearly as practicable at that point.

Contributing to these ends, the National Grange recommends the following measures:

1. An increased purchase in large volume of securities in the open market by the Federal reserve banks.

2. Reduction of rediscount rates by the Federal reserve banks.

3. Reduction of the legal minimum gold reserve ratios of the Federal reserve banks to points materially below the present 35 and 40 per cent legal ratios, to the end that the surplus gold in the United States may be exported without endangering the gold standard.

4. An international monetary conference for the purpose of (a) stabilizing the gold price of silver and (b) stabilizing the purchasing power of gold in terms of the average of wholesale prices of commodities.

The National Grange, through its executive committee, is prepared to cooperate with other organizations to secure the adoption of these policies and such other policies as may soundly contribute to the attainment of a restored and stabilized price level.

Tariff Policy of the National Grange

Whereas the workings of our tariff system have a vital bearing upon agriculture:

Resolved, That the National Grange adopt the following tariff policy:

1. So long as the American protective policy is maintained, we favor such rates of import duty as will insure the American market to the American farmer upon farm commodities which can be produced advantageously in any part of our country.

2. Since it is well understood that producers of surplus crops receive no direct tariff benefits, equality and justice demand that import duties on commodities which the farmer must buy should be fixed at fair and reasonable levels.

3. We advocate that growers of crops of which we produce an exportable surplus shall be accorded equalized tariff benefits such as are proposed under the export debenture system.

4. Because the natural resources of the country should be wisely used and conserved for the benefit of this and succeeding generations, we affirm that it is contrary to sound public policy to impose tariffs for the protection of such resources as can not be renewed when they are once exhausted.

5. In no case should tariff rates be granted which breed monopoly, enriching the few at the expense of the many, and which encourage inefficiency rather than efficiency in American industry.

6. We reaffirm the long-established policy of the grange in demanding "tariff for all or tariff for none."

Land Policy of the National Grange

The profound changes in agricultural conditions during the past decade have given rise to extensive problems calling for readjustments in the matter of land utilization.

It is apparent from the tendency toward self-sufficiency in European markets and increased competition of other countries which sell in the world market, together with other developments, that we do not need policies to stimulate agricultural expansion.

The National Grange believes the forming of a comprehensive land policy should be started at once, looking toward the guidance of public action affecting farm lands and lands of other classifications.

There is an obvious need for the coordination of the activities of Federal and State agencies in the development of such a policy. In the opinion of the grange, the land-grant colleges and universities can contribute an essential element not only in bridging the gap between Federal and State interests but in assuring that partisan politics may be ruled out of the picture.

Organized agriculture should cooperate in the formation of such policies, as it must be expected to participate in carrying them out. We recommend as the policy of the National Grange the following:

1. The remnants of the public domain should not be turned over to the States but a comprehensive national land policy should include provisions for better consolidation of Federal and State holdings, and for the administration of the public land, through reforesting or otherwise, so as to insure conservation and avoid improper use of this natural resource.

2. The use of Federal, State, or other public money, except in connection with economically feasible projects already in existence, should be stopped so far as it contributes to the further development of land for agricultural purposes. A better use for reclamation funds would be to employ them in refunding indebtedness of irrigation and drainage districts needing assistance. In projects in which the main purposes of the use of public funds are for flood control, development of water power, or similar purposes, any subsidiary use of the water for bringing new farms into operation should be held in abeyance until there is evident need for additional agricultural land.

3. The forestry laws of the Nation and States should be so broadened as to permit purchase of submarginal agricultural land whether suitable for forest purposes, recreational uses, or game preserves.

4. In the case of lands under Federal control the administration of oil, mineral, or other subsurface uses should be separated from the administration of the agricultural, forestry, and other surface uses, the administration of the latter to be intrusted entirely to the United States Department of Agriculture, and so far as practicable to a single bureau charged with their conservation.

5. We recommend a continuing survey by the United States Department of Agriculture in cooperation with agricultural experiment stations and other State agencies to determine the productive possibilities of land in order that submarginal lands may be definitely defined and located, and that the best type of production may be determined for various areas and localities.

6. We recommend that State and subordinate granges study and discuss the land situation within each State and support legislation looking toward constructive State land policies consistent with land policies for the larger regions, and for the Nation as a whole.

The future of the Nation will largely depend on our present ability to shape a program of land utilization which will discourage agricultural overproduction, devote land to the uses to which it is best adapted, conserve our resources, coordinate agriculture with forestry, preserve the beauty of the countryside, and provide adequately for our future needs for timber.

Equalizing the Tax Burdens

The following recommendations were adopted by the National Grange at Sixty-fifth Annual Session, Madison, Wis., November 11–20, 1931:

FEDERAL

1. No reduction in the Federal income tax.

2. Maintain and increase the estate tax and allow the States to retain a greater portion of tax collected.

3. The collection of a limited tax on luxuries.

4. A substantial portion of the Federal corporation income tax returned to the States, and the individuals paying both Federal and State income tax to be allowed to deduct from his Federal tax a substantial portion of his State income tax.

5. To avoid evasion of the purposes of the estate tax there should be a Federal and State gift tax.

STATE AND LOCAL

1. A debt control law.

2. Pending the enactment of Federal legislation under which a substantial portion of Federal income tax is apportioned to the State there should be an equitable graduated income tax, with low exemptions and low rates. Credit to the Federal income-tax payer for State income taxes paid up to a reasonable per cent of the Federal tax would help to induce States to adopt the personal income tax, and would be conducive to greater uniformity in income taxation among the States.

3. Limitation of all special assessments against real estate.

We urgently recommend the study of the relative merits of various State budgetary control laws, especially those of Indiana and Iowa, to the end that those being followed might be improved and local governments following no budget law might be induced to adopt the better system.

We oppose:

1. Issuing bonds to cover current expenses.

2. General sales tax, either Federal or State.

3. The use of funds obtained from automobile licenses and gasoline taxes for other than highway purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. It will be read for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 37) providing for the filling of vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, which now exist, be filled by the appointment of R. Walton Moore, of Virginia, William Cabell Bruce, of Maryland, and Charles G. Dawes, of Illinois.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, this is a joint resolution and it should be treated the same as a bill. It has been the uniform custom in the Senate not to allow the passage of bills and joint resolutions until they have been referred to and reported by a committee. I know this is not a specially important matter; but if its passage is to be considered as a precedent in the future, it will lead us into all sorts of trouble. It seems to me a committee could very soon report out the joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think this is an important matter. I would like to submit an inquiry at this point to the Senator from Utah. I inquire whether the vacancies which were supposed to be filled under another joint resolution passed in the last Congress have ever been filled?

Mr. SMOOT. I could not say.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator another question, then. The Senator introduced a joint resolution to fill a vacancy on the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, about which we had considerable discussion, and that resolution went over. We had an understanding that it would be taken up later. I had an understanding with the Senator from Utah that he would not call it up in my absence and that I would not call it up in his absence. That joint resolution was never called up.

Mr. SMOOT. That joint resolution is dead. It died with the expiration of the last Congress.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, under the circumstances I must object. Let the joint resolution go to a committee and let the committee report upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

POSTPONEMENT OF PAYMENT OF FOREIGN DEBTS

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933.

Most of our debtors have payments falling due on December 15, next, and it is essential that legislation be enacted before that date authorizing the postponement of such amounts, or the governments in question will be in default.

I am not going to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution which I have introduced, but I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 38) to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

WAR POLICIES COMMISSION

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, to which he calls the attention of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. The message will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the message, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a progress report of the War Policies Commission created by Public Resolution No. 98, Seventy-first Congress, approved June 27, 1930.

I concur in the request of the commission that appropriate congressional action be taken to extend by 90 days the time within which the final report of the commission shall be made.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 7, 1931.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the War Policies Commission has completed all of its work under the terms of the act bringing it into being except that it has not as yet received from the Attorney General his conclusive legal findings. In order to embody those findings in the report, a request for an additional 90 days' time is made without any accompanying appropriation or expense. In order to effectuate the request for an extension of time, I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask unanimous consent may be read and considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 39) extending the time within which the War Policies Commission is required to submit its final report, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the time within which the War Policies Commission, created by Public Resolution No. 98, Seventy-first Congress, approved June 27, 1930, was required to submit its final report to the Congress be, and the same is hereby, extended 90 days.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The message of the President will lie on the table.

OWNERSHIP OF STOCK BY PRESIDENTIAL AND OTHER CANDIDATES

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I introduce a Senate joint resolution. It is very short. I send it to the desk and ask that it be read. It should be referred, I assume, to the Judiciary Committee.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 40) requiring candidates for election to the Presidency, Vice Presidency, the Senate, House of Representatives, and nominees to the Cabinet to file with the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives a verified statement of ownership, if any, of securities, foreign or domestic, owned by said candidates, was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That within 15 days after an announcement of candidacy for election to the office of President, Vice President, United States Senator, and Representative, and within 15 days after the nomination of any candidate for any of the said offices named above, and within 15 days after the nomination of members of the President's Cabinet, such candidate or nominee shall file with the Secretary of the United States Senate, if a candidate for President, Vice President, Senator, or nominee for the President's Cabinet, and with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, if a candidate for Congress, a statement, verified by oath, setting out in detail the following information, which information shall be accessible to the public:

1. An itemized list of all bonds, public or private, stocks, and securities owned by such candidate or nominee, directly or indirectly, or in which such candidate or nominee has an equitable or beneficial interest or in which such candidate or nominee has had such direct, indirect, equitable, or beneficial interest within 12 months immediately preceding the filing of such affidavit.

2. A detailed list of the location of offices of the companies or corporations issuing such stocks, securities, and bonds, so far as known to the candidate or nominee, and the countries in which such companies or corporations do business.

3. A list of all companies in which such candidate or nominee is an officer or director, or in which he was an officer or director within 12 months previous to the filing of such affidavit.

RADIO-KEITH-ORPHEUM PROPOSED RECEIVERSHIP

Mr. DILL. I submit a Senate resolution which I would like to have read, after which I may ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 58), as follows:

Whereas Radio Corporation of America has a substantial stock interest in Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation; and

Whereas Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation has publicly declared it has been unable through any bank or banks to secure necessary financial assistance; and

Whereas a proposed plan for refinancing Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation requires subscription by each stockholder to a pro rata of $11,600,000 debentures of said corporation and by failure so to do such stockholder is deprived of three-fourths of his shares of stock and the same is turned over to Radio Corporation of America as a bonus for purchasing such stockholder's unsubscribed debentures; and

Whereas such plan unfairly affects the interests of over 25,000 stockholders of 10 or more shares of Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation stock and gives Radio Corporation of America other special privileges and shares of stock; and

Whereas the stockholders have been threatened by the president of Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation with a receivership of said corporation unless the plan is carried out, and that a receivership would probably result in the loss of the entire investment of stockholders: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency, or any subcommittee thereof, as authorized by Senate Resolution 71, of the Seventy-first Congress, agreed to May 5, 1930, is hereby authorized and directed to fully investigate the refinancing of Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation, and particularly the ownership, sale and transfer, and price on the New York Stock Exchange of the stock of said corporation during the calendar year 1931, and the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized and empowered to exercise for the purposes of this resolution all the powers and authority contained in said Senate Resolution 71.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, this resolution, coming as it does under Resolution 71, would, as I understand, not be required to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I wish to say just a few words about the situation which has been disclosed.

The stock of the Radio-Keith-Orpheum Co. has declined to less than $2 per share, largely because of this attempt to compel every one of the shareholders to pay $5 a share or lose three-fourths of the stock by the Radio Corporation of America taking it up. It seems such an unjust attack upon the rights of those stockholders that it appeared to me that it very properly came under the Senate resolution which had been passed. However, those who are interested in this matter have come to me and asked if I would not let the resolution go over under the rule until the next meeting of the Senate. For that reason I should like to let the resolution lie on the table under the rule for one day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not had time to read the resolution, but he is advised that it calls for an additional burden upon the contingent fund. If so, the resolution should be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. DILL. I wish the Chair would examine the resolution before he rules on that question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the resolution shall be ordered to lie on the table, the Chair will examine it a little later.

Mr. DILL. I hope the Chair will do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Washington will lie on the table for the present.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I present a resolution authorizing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to hold hearings during the Seventy-second Congress and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be reported for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 59), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee an Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Seventy-second Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. JONES. I understand that such resolutions should go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The resolution calls for no appropriation.

Mr. JONES. My recollection is that in the usual course such resolutions go to that committee.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

SENATOR FROM NORTH CAROLINA—CONTEST

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, to determine the contest of George M. Pritchard against Josiah W. Bailey for a seat in the United States Senate, and ask that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be so referred.

Said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, shall have power to issue subpœnas and require the production of all papers, books, documents, or other evidence pertinent to said investigation, and to impound ballot boxes and all records and paraphernalia used in the election in question, and said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess of the Senate or of the Congress, and to hold its sessions at such places as it may deem proper.

It shall have authority to employ clerks and other necessary assistance and to employ stenographers at a cost not to exceed 25 cents per 100 words, and to cause to be taken and recorded all evidence received by the committee, and to have said evidence printed for the information of the Senate.

The Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and his deputies and assistants are hereby required to attend the said Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, and to execute its directions.

The chairman of the committee and each and every member thereof is hereby empowered to administer oaths and generally have such powers and perform such duties as are necessary or incident to the exercise of the powers and duties imposed by this resolution.

Said committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date.

The cost of investigations and proceedings in pursuance of the foregoing to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and not to exceed $25,000.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, authorized by Senate Resolution No. 415, agreed to February 5, 1931, to engage counsel for the purpose of instituting proceedings to secure a determination of the right of George Otis Smith to the position of member of the Federal Power Commission, hereby is authorized, in the prosecution of such litigation, to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate $5,000 in addition to the counsel fees heretofore authorized.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

SUMMARY OF CONNECTICUT'S ACTIVITIES IN WAR (S. DOC. NO. 14)

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask leave to have printed as a Senate document a Summary of Connecticut's Activities in the Wars of This Country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MEETINGS OF COMMITTEES BEFORE REORGANIZATION

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I should like to say that there seems to be some confusion in the minds of Senators about the meeting of committees at this time. Some chairmen of committees have called meetings of their committees and business has been transacted. Other chairmen have wanted to call meetings but have not done so because a reorganization of committees has not taken place. It occurs to me that under the ruling of the Chair—a very proper and correct one—committees of the Senate are continuing committees, and that it is entirely proper for the chairmen of any committee to call a meeting of his committee and for the committee to transact business. I understand that under the rule committees of the Senate are continuing; there can be no question about that; but a number of chairmen of committees have come to me to ask me whether or not it would be proper to call meetings of committees. I have not said that it was in order because I wanted to find out whether or not the Chair would so decide; but it is in accordance with the rule. I have no doubt in the world that it is entirely proper for the chairman of any committee to call his committee together and to proceed to transact business in the committee until the committee on committees shall have reported the new committees.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Indiana when the committee on committees will report?

Mr. WATSON. I am assured by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] the committee on committees will report next Monday. Then the reorganization can take place, but until that time I think it entirely proper for committees to meet and transact business.

SHORT SELLING

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, there has been considerable discussion over the country of the evils of short selling on the stock exchanges and grain exchanges. My attention has been called to a discussion of short selling, written by William R. Perkins, an attorney of New York, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

SHORT SELLING—A REPLY TO THE ADDRESS OF RICHARD WHITNEY, PRESIDENT NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE, BEFORE THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF HARTFORD, CONN., OCTOBER 16, 1931

Exchanges are necessary when properly run. When not properly run they are a menace. In the ultimate the corporations whose shares are listed and the owners of those shares are responsible. The exchanges could not exist should the shares of our leading corporations be no longer listed there. It is this view that has induced, for the consideration of corporations and their shareholders, as well as of our public officials, this reply to the address on this subject delivered by Mr. Richard Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, before the Chamber of Commerce of Hartford, Conn., on October 16, 1931.

It is a fair summary of the address to say that Mr. Whitney upholds unregulated short selling, even in the trying times through which we have been passing, because he considers it not only a legal act necessary to distant sellers, for "hedging," and that odd-lot houses may properly function, but above all because in his opinion without it there could not be that free market which he deems essential to equalization of prices and support in times of crisis; that every man who has sold short is "a potential buyer of securities, and this is a source of great stability to a market," especially "in times of crisis when other people hesitate to buy and the short sellers represent the purchasing power which prevents the market from becoming demoralized."

He finds proof of the correctness of his position in the action of the market when short selling was suspended for a brief period on account of Great Britain abandoning the gold standard, in the statistics he gives and in the behavior of the bond market where he says short selling is all but impossible and yet "probably the greatest and most ridiculous declines have taken place in bonds rather than in shares."

By this reasoning and survey he concludes and reiterates that "the real cause of declining security prices, as I have said, was not short selling but the continued liquidation of stocks held both outright and on margin."

We may at once lay aside all question of the legality of short sales and of borrowing stocks for that purpose. No one disputes that in and of itself a short sale is legal, when not a mere cover for a bet on the rise and fall of the market (Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S. 499; Brooks v. People's Bank, 233 N. Y. 87, 96–97); but that is quite beside the point. Regulation presupposes legality, else there would be total prohibition instead. It has its genesis and justification in the incapacity or unwillingness of the operators of legitimate enterprises to curb excesses and prevent abuses. Indeed, a legal act is not only subject to regulation to prevent excesses and abuses, but may by these excesses and abuses be rendered a crime punishable by fine and imprisonment. Take for instance a pool formed to depress prices by short selling, as well as short selling accompanied by false rumors or with the malevolent motive of taking advantage of distressed circumstances in reckless disregard of the rights and necessities of others. (See Aikens v. Wisconsin, 195 U. S. 194, 204–206; Granada Lumber Co. v. Mississippi, 217 U. S. 433, 439; and Bedford Cut Stone Co. v. Journeymen Stonecutters Association, 274 U. S. 37, 54.) Consider the laws regulating banks, railroads, and public utilities. And if it be said that these are businesses affected with a public interest, whereas exchanges do not come in that category, although shares of these enterprises are listed upon them, we have but to call attention to our usury and blue sky laws, our pure food and drug act, the Federal Trade Commission with its power over unfair practices, and the Clayton Act with its provisions preventing tying contracts, discriminating prices, and interlocking directorates.

We may also lay aside all questions of short selling to aid delivery by distant owners, in order to hedge and that odd-lot houses may function properly. These are among those incidental matters for which appropriate provision must be made in all systems of regulation. They do not come in the category of the kind of short selling we are here discussing and should not be allowed to becloud or dominate the real issue.

We are dealing here with the typical short seller whom Mr. Whitney has described as a man who has "become convinced that a certain security is selling at too high a price," feels that "it is certain to sell at a lower price in the future" and "wishes to take advantage of this situation." And the question is whether Mr. Whitney is right in saying that the real cause of the decline is not this kind of selling, but liquidation.

I can not agree with Mr. Whitney's answer to this question. A careful study and analysis of what has occurred in the light of the data he gives, meager and unsatisfactory as that data is in many important respects and despite his assertions to the contrary, has convinced me that large and unnecessary short selling, attracted by a promising prospect of decline which these very sales augmented, has had its natural and inevitable effect upon the streams of commerce in securities, just as a cloudburst has upon our watercourses. And in the suspension of short selling, as explained and described by Mr. Whitney, to meet the crisis when Great Britain abandoned the gold standard I find not only confirmation from the frantic action of these short sellers, but official recognition by the governing committee of the stock exchange itself, of this dominant effect on market decline by the short interest.

He says "the real point" of that crisis was that "a further liquidation of securities was inevitable" and to meet it "by unanimous vote of the governing committee, short selling was forthwith suspended for that day and until further notice," instead of closing the exchange or establishing minimum prices, either of which latter would have had a direct effect on the further liquidation. He says the reason for this action was "the duty" of the exchange to remain open so that this further inevitable liquidation "might be accomplished in an orderly manner"; that "it was certain that no buying power great enough to meet the emergency was to be found except in the short interest"; and that "in the opinion of the committee, a sudden ban on short selling would be likely to force covering by those who were short, thus steadying the market temporarily until the immediate shock of the London news could be dissipated." The result, he tells us, was that "within two hours after short selling was forbidden" frantic endeavors of the shorts to cover had produced "a real danger of technical corners and of crazy and dangerous price advances"; that there had accumulated buying orders for 8,000 shares of General Motors at the market, with no stock offered for sale within many points of 30¼, the last preceding sale and the highest price that stock had reached at any time during this period; that Reading Co. stock opened at 48¼, advanced to a high of 75 and subsequently declined to 62; and that similar situations existed in leading and active share issues, such as United States Steel, American Can, and others.

Now I could follow the thought of the committee and understand the reaction on the part of short sellers which followed, if the decline had been dominated by short selling and not liquidation; because in that event mere suspension of short selling would relieve that pressure, a natural rebound would occur, and the short interest, uncertain of the rebound's extent, might well be frantic in its endeavor to minimize the effect by prompt covering. But I can not understand the opinion of the committee that mere suspension of short selling, without requirement of short covering, "would be likely to force a covering by those who were short," if it believed with Mr. Whitney that liquidation, not short selling, had been the cause of the decline and further liquidation was imminent and inevitable. To my mind that process of reasoning is unnatural and illogical, a complete non sequitur. Why should one who has sold for the decline be expected to cover by reason of mere suspension of short selling, if he believes liquidation, not short selling, has caused the decline and that further liquidation is imminent and inevitable? Why should the governing committee attribute to him any other than the following process of reasoning: I sold to buy back at lower prices; further short selling has been suspended, but no short covering has been required; liquidation, not short selling, has caused the decline; further liquidation is imminent and inevitable; I will await the lower prices this further liquidation should bring.

So I can not accept Mr. Whitney's conclusions in view of the action of the governing committee and of the short interest when short selling was suspended, as above stated. I am bound to regard that as confirmation both by the committee and the short interest of the dominant effect at that time of the short interest in the market.

The statistics given by Mr. Whitney amply confirm the dominant effect of short selling on stock-market values. Taking the rise and fall in the short interest as given by Mr. Whitney and comparing it with the compilation by the New York Times [in its issue of October 2, 1931] of 240 issues comprising 20 groups of common stock listed on the New York Stock Exchange, we have the following most significant figures:

On May 25, according to Mr. Whitney, the short interest reached a peak of 5,589,700 shares. And during that month the decline in the market value of these groups of common stocks was $3,782,578,527.

Thereafter, says Mr. Whitney, this short interest "fell considerably," with prices remaining unchanged until the international debt moratorium was announced [June 22], "when the short interest dropped still further, as the excited but temporary rise in prices ensued." And we find these groups increased in market value $3,235,401,713 in June.

Mr. Whitney says that "through August the short interest increased somewhat" and "rose to a new peak of 4,480,000 shares on September 11," which fell "to 4,241,000 shares on September 18." And we find that these groups decreased $7,188,722,493 in market value during the month of September.

The Wall Street Journal for October 20, 1931, gives a table entitled "New York Stock Exchange Market Value of All Stocks and Bonds Listed," in which it shows that the market value of such common and preferred stocks decreased $3,718,371,986 from March 1 to April 1, further decreased $4,766,406,010 from April 1 to May 1, still further decreased $6,036,002,809 from May 1 to June 1, thus giving a progressive decrease in market values which totalled $14,520,780,805 when the short interest was reaching its peak of May 25, given by Mr. Whitney; then we have an increase of $4,883,161,905 from June 1 to July 1, when the short interest became excited and covered considerably, according to Mr. Whitney, because of the announcement of the international debt moratorium; and thereafter we have a decrease of $2,994,407,135 from July 1 to August 1, a slight increase of $164,285,644 from August 1 to September 1, and the tremendous final decrease of $12,259,988,669 from September 1 to October 1, when the short interest was making the second peak, given by Mr. Whitney.

It seems idle to gainsay the great downward pressure exerted by the accumulation of these large short interests in view of the above record and of the frenzied upturn occasioned by the brief suspension of short selling on September 21, when we note that there was a covering of only about one-eighth of the short interest existing that day.

But even the above figures give the public a very insufficient measure of the pressure of short selling; for, as I have said, they are meager and unsatisfactory in important respects. It was not until late September that they embraced short sales executed and covered on the same day. They afford us no comparison of short sales with total sales, either as a whole or, what is more important still, with respect to active stock leaders such as General Motors, Reading, United States Steel, and American Can, which so reacted when the suspension of short selling came.

The truth and significance of these statements have been attested in the financial columns of two of our leading newspapers.

The New York Times last Sunday said of Mr. Whitney's address in this respect:

"It is among the professionals who are already acquainted with the subject and who, by the way, are in full agreement with Mr. Whitney, that the first criticism is heard. For instance, they make the point that spokesmen for the exchange might put less emphasis upon the familiar theory that the short account serves as a powerful cushion in declining markets and that it restrains inflationary tendencies. There is an apparent incongruity here when a speaker, in another paragraph, stresses that the short account is infinitesimal by comparison with the number of shares listed. 'The aggregate short interest in the market, even at its May 25 peak of 5,589,700 shares,' Mr. Whitney asserted, 'constituted only two-fifths of 1 per cent of the 1,305,516,716 shares listed as of June 1.' Practical market men consider this comparison almost meaningless. In the first place, bearish operators are far too clever to scatter their fire; instead of selling the entire list, they concentrate on vulnerable stocks.

"Mr. Whitney's statistics relating to the short account are interesting, in spite of the fact that they are concededly incomplete, because it was not until September 25 that the exchange made its questionnaire sufficiently sweeping to expose the full scope of the speculation for the decline. At present the exchange is requiring a daily report of the short accounts of all member firms, including short sales executed and covered on the same day. Even this searching inquiry will not tell the whole story for the reason that in all probability short selling has diminished in volume as a direct result of the exchange's closer scrutiny and its present attitude, which seriously handicap the short seller."

And the financial editor of the New York Evening Post in that paper's edition of the 19th says that many people will "wonder why he did not compare the volume of short sales on a given day, or within a stipulated period, with the total volume of sales.

"In the final analysis a comparison of the total short interest with the total number of shares listed on the exchange is of very limited value. It gives almost no information on the real amount of short selling which might have taken place in a critical period.

"For example, suppose that on a given day there is heavy short selling in the morning which 'breaks' the market and forces widespread selling by those holding stocks on margin, and that before the end of the day the shorts take advantage of the lower prices and cover. The total short interest at the end of the day, obviously, would be the same as it was at the start, although the market action might have been almost entirely the result of short selling.

"Still further, the total short selling may be concentrated in a very few issues, with the result that there is a sharp drop in their prices. If these are market leaders the whole tone of the market may be changed, although the volume of short selling is small, as compared with the total volume of transactions. Even comparisons on a daily basis, therefore, would need careful interpretation.

"In general, then, we are still in an extremely poor position for arriving at a sound decision on the question of short selling. It is interesting, of course, to know what the total short position on given days was, but we should like to know more."

The figures Mr. Whitney gives were no inadvertence on his part. Under date of September 30 I wrote him, asking this information as to the short interest, pointing out that it should be given not in terms of listed securities but with respect to gross sales and, if possible, with respect to the sales of the active leading share issues. The only reply I received was that "any statements that are issued by the exchange on this or any other subject will be handled in our customary manner." Mr. Whitney has seen fit to break down the number of short accounts so as to tell us that the average short account was "only about 400 shares each." He should be likewise willing to break down the short interest into its representation of the active leading issues.

Similar confirmation of the great and unnecessary downward pressure of short selling comes from a consideration of its nature and process. The short seller sells the stock he thinks likely to decline and delivers shares borrowed for the purpose from those carried on margin by brokers for their customers. He may, and does, repeat the operation as often as he desires. And on each repetition the borrowed shares upon delivery go largely back, for like subsequent use, into this pool of shares carried by brokers on margin. In this way the shares carried on margin become a reservoir or revolving source of shares for delivery in consummation of the short sale of a vastly greater number of shares than those carried on margin at any given time. The result is a tremendous artificial magnification of the quantity of selling through the medium of short sales, which converts the capacity to short sell into a mighty engine of destruction of values in times of distress, such as those through which we are passing. And thus we find the vice in the practice of short selling to be its entire freedom from the salutary restraint of the requirement of bona fide ownership of the shares sold at the time of making the sale, which would confine the quantity of sales into those which corresponded to actual supply and demand.

This brings me to the behavior of the bond market and puts us in a position to appraise it properly. I think the selling in it was largely liquidation and that the prices did become ridiculous when we consider the character of many of the bonds sold. But I can not accept Mr. Whitney's statement that this "completely shatters the contention that it is the short seller who has forced prices down." For that statement ignores the effect on bonds, as indeed on our whole business fabric, of these great declines in the stock market. The price charts show that the decline in bonds corresponded with the decline in stocks under the short-selling pressure, as above noted. The table of the Wall Street Journal, which I have mentioned above, shows that all bonds listed on the New York Stock Exchange decreased in market value $180,685,404 from April 1 to May 1, and $652,637,852 from May 1 to June 1, then increased $1,503,197,519 from June 1 to July 1, when they began to decline, the decline being $757,149,925 from July 1 to August 1, $1,056,772,472 from August 1 to September 1, and $4,287,526,124 from September 1 to October 1.

These charts and figures make it perfectly plain that the "ridiculous" prices to which Mr. Whitney refers came from the September debacle in stock values when, despite the previous drastic decline, they fell an average of 30 per cent in as many days, or for a total of $7,188,722,493 for the 240 issues compiled by the New York Times, as above stated, and $12,259,988,669 for common and preferred stocks in the Wall Street Journal table above mentioned. It approached in magnitude the original break in the Fall of 1929. Bank failures during September were the second largest on record. According to Bradstreet the total failures in that month set a high point for all time. So fast and far went this crumbling of stock values that panic stalked abroad and occasioned good bonds being thrown overboard by bankers to preserve liquidity, by individuals and concerns to prevent larger losses in stocks they held, and by those who were scared into actually hoarding, which became the order of the day and has been estimated to amount to as much as a billion dollars.

Finally, Mr. Whitney in support of his position quotes the statement of Mr. Justice Holmes in Chicago Board of Trade v. Christie G. & S. Co. (198 U. S. 236, 49 L. ed. 1031), as to grain futures. In this Mr. Whitney is unfortunate. Thereby he admits the similarity of short sales of commodities and securities. Subsequently Congress investigated the short selling of grain. As a result it passed the grain futures act, in which it declared that such transactions are "susceptible to speculation, manipulation, and control and sudden or unreasonable fluctuations in the prices * * * which are detrimental to the purchaser, to the producer or the consumer and the persons handling," and "an obstruction to and a burden upon interstate commerce." And this declaration and act of Congress was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in Board of Trade of the City of Chicago v. Olsen (262 U. S. 1, 67 L. ed. 839), in an opinion by Chief Justice Taft, in which he said:

"Manipulations of grain futures for speculative profit, though not carried to the extent of a corner or complete monopoly, exert a vicious influence and produce abnormal and disturbing temporary fluctuations of prices that are not responsive to actual supply and demand."

The truth is that rank speculation, in which some of our banking interests joined, has played havoc. We saw values pyramided to an apex in 1929, with some of our banking interests, through their affiliated companies, taking full part, not only for their own securities but in the promotion of other securities. We now see a speculation for the decline bringing an avalanche which has obtained proportions, through instillation of fear, that all the forces of construction seem powerless to stop. The President has made a mighty effort through the National Credit Corporation, and yet reports show still a most unhappy situation throughout the country.

I am therefore sincerely and definitely of the opinion that such short selling has been a major cause of the prolongation and intensification of the depression; that it is an unnecessary sale, being neither forced nor from a desire to change investment, but solely to make a profit from the expected decline; that such sales augment a decline by the additional burden they impose; that the short sellers hope for a lower market in order to make their profit and thereby temptation brings those vague forebodings and mysterious rumors which undermine our psychology and sap our initiative; that regulation should prevent such an occurrence for the sake of our country, its enterprises, and those who invest in their securities; and that, as has been the case with other concerns, this regulation of exchanges must come from the outside and not from within. Mr. Whitney's address shows an attitude on the part of the stock exchange and its membership that forbids any other expectation.

My suggestions are:

(1) That there should be an exhaustive inquiry into short selling, in all its ramifications, in order that, in definite detail, the real facts may be ascertained and given to the public. Mr. Whitney has practically challenged such an investigation. He says: "I would like to ask what proof there is—not blind prejudice, not vague assertions, but actual proof and evidence—that bear raiding has taken place in the stock market." This challenge should be fully met, for the sake both of the exchange and the public interest.

(2) The exchanges should be placed under the Federal Trade Commission, with the requirement that all short sales be accompanied by full, definite information, in a manner available to the public. I feel that the exchange's business is of such a character, so conducted, and has such an important bearing on all business that it may be regulated as a part of interstate commerce, under such decisions as United States v. Patten (226 U. S. 525) and the cases it cites and which have cited it.

(3) Brokers should be brought under our banking laws. They conduct a large loan business. As security for these loans they hold the stock bought by their customers. This stock has constituted the great reservoir for the stock loaned on short sales. Brokers should have no more right to lend for this purpose stock pledged with them than is the power of the bank to lend for such purpose stock pledged as collateral with the bank. If brokers can not be brought directly under our banking laws, indirect pressure to this effect can be put upon them through forbidding loans by those affiliated with the Federal Reserve System to brokers who lend stock for such purposes.

(4) Short selling should be made unattractive through a separate, additional income tax on the profits in connection with short sales, with no offsetting losses allowed. This would also give quite an appreciable item of additional revenue to the Government. The statistics given by Mr. Whitney, inadequate as they are, show that for 1931 the profits from short sales must have been enormous; and for that year I think the percentage of such tax should be considerable.

(5) Our banking laws should be so amended as that banks and trust companies will be confined to a strictly banking business and not allowed in any way, directly or indirectly, to have controlled or affiliated companies by which they deal in securities as owners or on commission.

THE SILVER QUESTION

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in yesterday's issue of the New York Times on the subject of the silver question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the New York Times, December 9, 1931]

(The writer of the following article is a financial authority of international reputation who has made a special study of the silver question.)

By Nicolas Raffalovich

Silver is again in the foreground. Some of the arguments advanced in favor of silver remind one of the days of William Jennings Bryan. The old theoretical fight between bimetallists and monometallists has been very unfortunately revived, unfortunately because the real practical problem of silver in the monetary systems and the economics of our days remains in the shadow and because the very word "silver" frightens not only the orthodox economists but all those who would not like to see a new edition of the Bryan campaign.

However, it is high time that serious consideration should be given to this problem in the light of to-day's situation and of recent history.

Whatever the practical or theoretical discussion regarding the gold standard will lead to, and even from the point of view of its strongest partisans, it can not be denied that before the war in 1914 the currency system of practically every country of western civilization was based upon the gold standard, but that despite that fact large quantities of silver were used as divisionary coinage. At the same time, the countries of the east either had a silver standard or, like India, a sterling exchange standard; and in the interior silver was practically the sole monetary token. In other words, a kind of equilibrium had been reached, which lasted from 1895 to 1917, in which silver played its natural and historical part in eastern countries and a subsidiary part in the western gold-standard countries, and where the fluctuation of silver prices, expressed in gold, was comparatively insignificant. From 1900 to 1914 these fluctuations were restricted between 0.54 and 0.62 ounce.

WAR FORCED UP PRICE

The World War produced, through war purchases in India and China, a rise of silver, which attained the price of $1.12 in 1919 and $1.02 in 1920, yearly average. Thereupon various countries, first of all Holland, then Great Britain, early in 1920, took advantage of the high price of silver to reduce the standard of their silver coinage. This example was followed by Australia, New Zealand, and by most of the principal countries of Europe and South America. A number of these countries abolished altogether their silver coinage, replacing it by small notes.

The result was that between 1920 and 1930 the sales from the demonetization of silver attained 225,000,000 ounces.

No wonder that this produced not only a drastic fall in silver prices but continuous fluctuations of this metal. In 1926 it had again attained the pre-war price, and from that year up to the spring of 1931 it did not cease its vertical movement down in a manner parallel to the sales by various governments who did not need any more their silver bullion for monetary purposes. The deathblow for silver was produced by the decision of the Indian Government to adopt the gold-bullion standard as a result of the findings of the Hilton-Young commission in 1926. Obviously, in order to procure for India the gold necessary for her new currency system, a large amount of silver had to be sold on the market, up to 400,000,000 ounces. It is curious to note that the Hilton-Young commission foresaw itself some of the consequences of such sales. In its report, dated July, 1926, it said:

"The effect of the announcement that the Indian Government proposed selling a large quantity of silver would be to immediately throw out of gear the exchange with China and, for a time, to paralyze the growing trade with the world of that country. The people of India have from time immemorial placed their trust in silver as the medium of exchange and as their store of value. They are deeply interested in the value of silver and it is contrary to their interest to depreciate it. The present proposal would inflict heavy losses on the poorer classes, who have put their savings in silver ornaments and who would find their stores of value depreciated by possibly 50 per cent by the action of the government."

At the same time the Governor of the Bank of England made the following statement:

"There is a reaction upon the gold prices when an extreme fall or rise takes place in the value of silver, which is none the less serious because it is indirect and not very apparent on the surface. The consequential changes in prices generally and in trade conditions which would be produced; the disturbance to the world's economic peace and confidence; the interference with the long-established social habits in the use of silver; the reliance of a great country like China upon silver as a medium of currency and a common store of value could not fail to have important effects upon the gold prices of countries in Europe and, indeed, in America."

LARGE SALES IN THE EAST

This did not prevent the Indian Government from introducing the gold-bullion standard, which was followed by the same measure by France in Indo-China. As long as the Indian policy remained unchanged the drop of silver continued almost without interruption up to November, 1931, when public attention was again focused on silver through statements published by the Imperial Economic Conference in London and by the International Chamber of Commerce, which indicated a change of feeling in England, in recognition of the errors made during the preceding decade. Between 1926 and the end of 1930, in addition to the sales of silver by various governments who did not need it any more as currency tokens, the Government of India sold 100,000,000 ounces and the Government of Indo-China 34,000,000 ounces, and the possibility of further sales was exercising a depressing influence on the market. In the meantime all the pessimistic predictions made in the above-mentioned British report and by the governor of the Bank of England have come true to a full degree. Silver had fallen lower than half of its value at the time the British commission was compiling its report. This fall of silver preceded the fall of commodity prices, which led the way to the general world depression.

The consequences of the silver decline showed themselves, as Montagu Norman so truly predicted, not only in the silver-producing and silver-using countries but all over the world by exercising a detrimental influence on the price level. This resulted not only in increasing difficulties of trade with the Far East, and of the general lowering of the standard of life in silver-using countries, which in its turn produced artificially the possibility for these countries to develop local industries to the detriment of foreign imports, such as textiles, but it also had the effect of decreasing the value of a considerable part of the world's currency represented by silver; in other words, it produced the consequences of a severe deflation; that is, an enhancement of the purchasing power of gold and a drop in prices. Silver production in itself had very little to do with these phenomena. According to the opinion of the best-known experts in that field, even in the boom years 1927–1929 silver production did not exceed normal world needs. To a great extent this production is parallel to such needs, as 70 per cent of the silver produced in the world is mined as a by-product of gold, zinc, copper, and lead. Therefore, silver production increases or decreases nowadays automatically in a manner parallel to world requirements.

However, it is not astonishing that the sales of nearly 400,000,000 ounces, derived not from production or accumulation of stocks by producers but from a change of policy by governments and central banks, completely upset normal conditions and exercised an artificial influence upon the market. The law of supply and demand was thus subjected to the influence of outside factors.

MERE MENTION AROUSED SUSPICION

For years those familiar with the significance of silver in the world's economy, and in particular the part it has played since time immemorial in the lives of one-half of the population of the globe, were urging the necessity of revising and reversing the highly unfortunate steps taken as a result of a temporary rise in silver during the war. The opposition they have encountered was largely due to the fact that many orthodox economists and heads of central banks go so far in their depreciation of artificial measures in the monetary or economic realm that they consider as a dangerous intervention what is merely a return to conditions which existed before the previously described mistakes had been made, as if errors were natural and as if an effort to correct them was an unwarranted intrusion on economic life. At the same time the mention of silver immediately arouses a suspicion of bimetallistic tendencies, while in reality the restoration of silver to the place it occupied in pre-war economics seems to be a very potent means of reinforcing the gold standard by liberating gold from the additional world burden it has to bear to-day and by invigorating world economics through an improvement in world prices.

Lately, under the impulse of the general movement in England toward recognition of past mistakes and toward reversal of unfortunate policies, the campaign regarding silver has received a new impetus, and a number of personalities most prominent in English public life have expressed themselves in favor of a complete change of attitude. In various countries many plans have been evolved for the purpose of restoring the value of silver and of stabilizing its price to a certain extent. This task is greatly facilitated by the fact that the ratio of the production of silver to the production of gold has remained practically unchanged over a very long period. It has been for centuries around 14 to 1 and since 1881 approximately 12 to 1. In the years 1928 and 1929 it was 13 to 1.

We have evidently arrived at the turning point when more and more people begin to recognize that the silver situation has a direct bearing upon the world depression, that its improvement might lead to a betterment of the world price level, and that, on the contrary, a further decline of silver would produce, over a time, a new fall in commodity prices. Many measures have been advanced as solutions of the silver problem. Under the influence of steps that have been taken or recommended regarding other commodities there have been attempts at concerted curtailment of production. This would merely leave the field open for sales of silver stocks belonging to governments or central banks, without assuring any future increase of the use of silver as divisionary coinage, in a way similar to pre-war times. Moreover, as has been indicated, the greatest part of the silver production is the result of mining other metals and, therefore, can not be avoided. Others have recommended an understanding between governments not to sell below a certain price, and to purchase for subsidiary coinage whenever the price should fall below a certain level. That in itself would certainly lead to an improvement, but again it does not answer the question how to repair the errors made during the period of 1920–1926, which can be generally characterized in this domain, as in many others, as the period of postwar mental fatigue.

Others would go so far as to insist upon silver being included in the reserves of central banks up to 15 per cent without realizing that this would be possible only through an increase of silver prices to probably four times the present level, and by establishing a fixed ratio between gold and silver. Such a drastic rise is not only undesirable but might lead to the opening up of new silver mines, of which there now exists no danger even should the present price be doubled. This proposal would lead to most complicated and long-winded theoretical discussions and to a series of problems which the mere restoration of silver to its pre-war function leaves untouched.

Without in any way entering into the debate on the gold standard, which only obscures the comparatively simple question regarding silver, seen in the light of the happenings of the last 10 years, it would appear as the simplest and most logical solution to direct efforts toward the moderate but adequate goal of a reversal of the artificial steps taken during recent years.

The main error, the introduction of the gold-bullion standard in India and the subsequent sales of silver by the Government of India, is a matter of British and Indian monetary policy and is intimately linked up with the decisions as to the fate of the pound sterling. On the gold-bullion standard in India a final solution can not be easily reached until the fluctuations in sterling have ceased through a temporary or final stabilization, as everybody both in England and in India will desire to avoid the cumulative effect of double fluctuations in sterling and in silver. For the present, however, it would be sufficient to indicate clearly the intention to revise the Indian monetary policy, stopping in the meantime the sale of Indian silver almost entirely.

There is another side which does not depend wholly upon Great Britain and India. They are powerless to make a decision for the countries which have followed Great Britain's example in 1920 by debasing their silver coinage or exceeded that example by abandoning such divisionary tokens altogether. This seems to be the main point upon which an agreement, and, possibly, a conference, seem to be highly desirable. There is no reason to impose upon countries like the United States that have already in their possession coined silver for nearly a billion dollars, of which two-thirds is in circulation, the burden of further acquisition of silver. Other countries, like France, that have reduced silver in circulation to practically nothing, may have only to keep their already existing stock of bullion. Others possess no silver, and there is no reason why for the sake of contributing to a general improvement in the world's condition they should not restore silver to its pre-war use by substituting the use of silver for notes of small denominations. They would most probably make a quite profitable operation for their central banks through the ensuing rise in silver, and in addition they would liberate part of their gold, which to-day serves as a covering for small notes.

STABILIZATION NOT IMPOSSIBLE

All this does not represent anything approaching a 15 per cent currency reserve in silver. For instance, the French stabilization law of 1928 authorized a maximum of silver coinage of 3,000,000,000 francs, which represents roughly only 3½ per cent of the French note circulation. In most cases it would be amply sufficient to authorize from 2 to 2½ per cent of the total circulation. As to the stabilization of silver prices, it is not impossible to devise practical means to further that end by a certain coordination of monetary policies of the central banks regarding their future purchases of silver for coinage uses. That would dispose of a certain part of the yearly output according to the general price situation in the market.

In measuring the effect of rehabilitation of silver, regardless of its result on world price levels, it must be taken into consideration that it will necessarily improve the standard of living of silver-using (which are also silver-hoarding) countries, as well as of those countries which produce silver, such as Mexico, Peru, and parts of the United States. The main tendency and the main sense of our economic civilization, its material achievement as well as its moral value, consist in the fact that for more than a hundred years it steadily, with only occasional interruptions, mostly produced by war, improved the standard of living in highly developed countries and that this was to a great extent rendered possible by similar improvement being continuously furthered in countries of a lower grade of development. Every measure likely to decrease the standard of life, and therefore the needs of the latter, invariably reflects on the former. An artificial struggle is created between the low and the high standard of living, as already indicated in the case of the Indian worker, victim of the fall in silver prices.

Rising from the level of everyday life to the heights of civilized thought and general economic principles, one can not fail to grasp that the casual, and, it is to be hoped, ephemeral, measures evolved in the postwar period, characterized by emergency legislation, have had a far-reaching effect directly upon one-half of the world's population and indirectly upon the balance of human beings inhabiting the globe, in absolute contradiction to the general scope of progress and prosperity. Viewed in this light the silver problem calls for immediate and careful consideration.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR BINGHAM ON THE PRINCIPLES OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address by my colleague the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], delivered at the national oratorical contest on May 23, 1931, on the importance of the widest possible understanding of the principles of government as laid down in the Constitution.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The principles of government as laid down in the Constitution are fundamentally those of individual freedom as opposed to paternalism or socialism and of representative government as opposed to pure democracy.

Our Constitution has been greatly admired and praised as one of the most remarkable documents ever drafted in the history of mankind. On it as a basis the United States grew from a small, unimportant, loosely knit collection of 13 newly created States to one of the most powerful nations in the world.

The Constitution was the result of the political thought and experience of the citizens of 13 English colonies, a fairly homogeneous group. Their experience in search of political, economic, and religious liberty covered a period of more than 150 years. They all understood the common law. Nearly all of them looked back to the English struggle for parliamentary government as opposed to absolute monarchy. Their ancestors were accustomed to dealing with local problems in their own way. They were self-reliant and proud of the rights they had secured which enabled them to have a large measure of local self-government.

The lessons which the framers of the Constitution and their ancestors had learned made them anxious to avoid the tyranny and despotism of a strong, central government. At the same time, in self-defense, they were obliged to give the Central Government sufficient power to provide for an army and a navy and for dignified dealings with foreign lands. In the days when the Constitution was written one did not have to argue about the importance of liberty and the dangers of bureaucracy. One did not have to explain the discomforts of tyranny and despotism.

To-day we are actually suffering from the curse of too much government, and yet many good people are urging us to amend the Constitution so as to give the central government even more power. They see the immediate benefits of paternalism. They fail to appreciate its deadening quality.

During the past 60 years millions of Europeans have come to our shores as emigrants from countries where their ancestors did not have the same background of law and the same appreciation of the advantages of local self-government as did the residents of the 13 colonies who framed and adopted the Constitution. Millions of American citizens have a racial and historic background which leads them to look to a paternal Government for guidance and support. To many of them the benefits of American liberty have been in large part the avoidance of compulsory military service, a practice which prevails in most parts of continental Europe, and also a flexible social and economic system which freely offers financial independence and social prominence to those with the wit, wisdom, and ability to rise to favored positions in the business world. Many of them do not understand the fundamental importance of maintaining those principles of the Constitution which favor individualism, representative government, and the retention by the States and their citizens of powers not explicitly granted to the Federal Government. They are not alone in this.

There are also many citizens, descended from American colonial stock, who have in recent years been willing to sacrifice State rights and personal liberty for the sake of greater efficiency in government, larger contributions from the United States Treasury, and the forcible securing of worthy ideals by law rather than voluntarily by public opinion. This is particularly true of the officers of some of the women's organizations who are actuated by unselfish motives.

There has been a tremendous amount of emotion rather than sound reason connected with much of the legislation which has been earnestly sought by well-organized groups of well-meaning citizens. In many cases our legislators have been carried away by emotional pleas and have created commissions and bureaus which have issued rules and regulations depriving us of our liberty in the name of efficiency and uniformity. The late President Hadley, of Yale, once said that "while the men of emotion may sometimes be right and the men of reason wrong, the chances in matters of legislation are most decidedly the other way. It is safe to say that the harm which has been done by laws based on unemotional reasoning is but a drop in the bucket compared with that which has been done by laws based on unreasoning emotion. * * * The good which state interference does is often something visible and tangible. The evil which it does is much more indirect, and can only be appreciated by careful study. The man who has his mind so fixed on some immediate object as to shut his eyes to the results of such study, is almost certain to advocate too much state action. He may succeed in passing a few good laws, but he will be responsible for a vastly larger number of bad ones. * * * Nothing can be more fatal to that efficiency of public opinion on which all good government rests than the habit of fixing our eyes on immediate consequences instead of permanent issues, or of giving to the emotions of a body of witnesses the dignity of the deliberate judgment of a court."

These words of President Hadley, although written many years ago, are just as true to-day as when they were written. It is very difficult to oppose legislation which will grant some immediate relief either of an economic, moral, or physical character, or which will correct some obvious abuse. It is difficult because the immediate end is seen to be good and few people care to bother about the ultimate result. In fact, it is frequently hard to see the more remote consequences. Whenever the Constitution stands in the way of the passage of this type of legislation, there is a wide popular clamor for a change in the Constitution. Nevertheless, human nature has not changed much, if any, since the Constitution was adopted. There is just as much danger to-day as there was then that a strong central government will build up a powerful bureaucracy which will in turn deprive us of our liberties and interfere with our rational freedom of action. The framers of the Constitution believed that individual liberty should be curtailed by law only in so far as public safety and order make necessary. Acting on this belief and under this fundamental principle, the United States has grown great and powerful. Recently, however, there has been constant agitation to restrict individual liberty for reasons of morality and efficiency and not because the public safety and order required it. Curiously enough, some of the most bitter critics of government are themselves constantly suggesting governmental action as a cure for social and economic ills.

One of the underlying principles of the Constitution is the principle of representative government. By representative government is meant a government whose officials are chosen by the people to represent them in making and enforcing the laws and whose duty it is to give their time, their attention, and their best thought to the problems of government and to the ultimate result of new laws, rules, and regulations. These things can be done better by carefully chosen and responsible representatives selected for this purpose than by the great mass of people who have little time to give to anything outside of their own immediate affairs, their business, and their hours of recreation and pleasure. Nevertheless, there is a constant tendency on the part of many of our public men to urge that we get away from representative government and go over into the field of pure democracy. The evils of pure democracy have been pointed out so often by political writers from the days of Aristotle down to the present that it is not necessary for me to enlarge upon them. It may be remarked in passing that no great successful business enterprise is conducted by the direct votes of all the stockholders. We have learned that the wisest course is for the stockholders to elect directors in whom they can place their trust and whose business it is to devote their time and attention to the problems before them. Of course, there is nothing more popular for a demagogue than to shout from the housetops magnificent phrases praising and flattering the wisdom of the people and decrying the wisdom of their chosen representatives. In insidious ways suggestions are made of the importance and value of submitting the most difficult international and national problems to millions of people who are too busy with their own affairs to be able to give the necessary time and thought to careful study.

History has shown this to be an unwise principle. It leads to disaster and the rule of emotion and mob psychology rather than the safe rule of reason. It was tried in Athens more than 1,000 years ago. Everything possible should be done to counteract this most reactionary tendency. The principle of representative government is one of the most precious in the Constitution. Nothing is more important than the clearest possible understanding of it and the most active loyalty to it.

The Constitution represents the wisdom of a homogeneous, self-governing people who dearly prized personal liberty and who appreciated the dangers of too much government. Any interference with the development of individualism is ultimately disastrous. Each man should be free to make his own mistakes, not because such mistakes are few, but because their repression by governmental commissions and bureaus involves also a repression of the best possibilities of good progress. The world's great inventions and improvements have been made by individual initiative and adopted reluctantly by Government bureaus and commissions. The Constitution favors individualism. It tries to leave people "free to make their own mistakes, trusting that the successful experiment will be followed and the unsuccessful one abandoned." The community profits from the errors made and learns wisdom thereby.

The present tendency toward paternalism in government will ultimately restrict the growth and development of the Nation, because it represents the wisdom of the present rather than the possibilities of the future. Centralized authority may give us immediate advantages and enable us to avoid grave mistakes, but it is sure to retard growth and kill the chances for that future development which comes only as a result of individual initiative and experimentation.

The principles of our Constitution are based on careful study of history, an appreciation of the strength and weakness of human nature, and sound reasoning. The dangers of emotional appeal are avoided. On the other hand, the way to rational progress is favored. For the sake of our country's future and our own happiness, it is most important to understand and appreciate the principles on which it is based.

THE NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF HEALTH—ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, on December 3, 1931, former Senator Joseph E. Ransdell, of Louisiana, who is now executive director, conference board of the National Institute of Health, delivered a very interesting and instructive address at St. Louis, Mo., before the annual convention of the Radiological Society of North America.

For the information of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Ransdell's remarks on this occasion be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Gentlemen of the Radiological Society of North America, it is a great pleasure and privilege to be with you to-night, and I thank you sincerely for this opportunity to discuss before you a subject which has been very near to my heart for many years—the National Institute of Health.

Radiology is the youngest of the sciences devoted to the study of physical man, being scarcely more than a third of a century old. Its accomplishments have been marvelous, and there is general belief that the surface of its potentialities for preventing and curing the diseases of human beings has been barely scratched.

While neither a doctor nor a scientist, I have been intensely interested in health problems for 25 years, and as executive director of the conference board of the National Institute of Health I am devoting all my energies to that institution—the Nation's research center in matters relating to public health.

The bill creating the institute was first introduced in the Senate on July 1, 1926, but it met with discouraging indifference on the part of most of my colleagues and failed of passage. Believing that persistence is the only cure for such a malady, I again introduced the bill on December 9, 1927. It fared a little better on this occasion, and passed the Senate, but was caught in a jam in the House and was killed by the termination of the session. In May, 1928, it was presented to Congress for the third time, and finally, on May 21, 1930, two years to the day after its third introduction, it received the approval of our legislative branch of government. President Hoover wrote the final chapter of this long story by signing the bill on the 26th of that month, and the National Institute of Health became a glorious reality.

During the four years of persistent effort following my first introduction of this measure many men of vision and love of their fellows assisted materially in making it understood by Congress and the country. This is especially true of the doctors, chemists, dentists, and other scientists who worked actively for the passage of the bill and secured resolutions indorsing it from their great national associations, thereby focusing the attention of Congress upon it. While a few Members of both Houses saw the exceptional merits of the measure and became crusaders under its banner, it was not until Senators and Representatives generally began to hear the voices of their constituents appealing for it that they gave it their support.

It is impossible to name all advocates of the bill, but I can not refrain from mentioning President Hoover, former President Coolidge, Secretary of the Treasury Andrew W. Mellon, and Francis P. Garvan, president of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.). These four great Americans saw with clear eyes the possibilities of the National Institute of Health for preventing and curing disease with its awful train of suffering and colossol economic losses to the world. Without their powerful help this dream of mine could never have come true. They and many others—especially doctors, chemists, and dentists—gave their whole-hearted support to the measure, and I wish to express my lasting appreciation to them.

I can not say too much of the splendid cooperation of the Chemical Foundation, through its wise and generous president, Mr. Garvan, who is so favorably known to radiologists. He gave unceasing and effective aid to the bill in its legislative journey of four years through Congress, and made the first gift to the institute of $100,000. I sincerely hope his example will shine brightly and be the guide for many Americans.

Societies such as yours are offered an ideal opportunity to cooperate with others in close union with the National Institute of Health under the terms of the act creating it. It stands ready to receive your aid in its search for solution of many unconquered diseases, which are still a curse to civilization. The Public Health Service, of which the National Institute of Health is a part, points to its wonderful record of the past and invites you to partake of the sacrifices and the glory which are the lot of scientific research workers in the cause of health. I trust you will join hands with this splendid agency and assist in giving to the world some measure of the true happiness which comes from good health.

While research activities in science have resulted in commendable reduction of mortality and alleviation of suffering we have not kept pace with the times in matters of public-health conservation. It is a sad commentary on the agencies dealing with health that influenza and pneumonia are as deadly to-day as they were a hundred years ago; that cancer and heart affections are claiming greater tolls in lives each year; and that the population of our institutions for the mentally deficient is increasing at an alarming rate. Dr. Charles W. Mayo, in a recent speech before the Annual Clinical Congress of the American College of Surgeons, said: "The world has moved ahead so fast as regards material civilization that man has almost for the moment got behind in his power of adaptation. Every other hospital bed in the United States is for mentally afflicted, insane, idiotic, feeble-minded, or senile persons."

It is only fair to say, however, that our lagging in the matter of health research has not been due to the inefficient mentality of our scientists, but to the woeful lack of facilities and the discouraging insufficiency of funds to stimulate recruits in science. The crying need of the American scientist engaged in a study of health problems is a great laboratory fully equipped to cope with every disease where he can carry on his work in close cooperation with other students of the laws of life, and with every possible facility at his disposal.

Provision was made for supplying that need by my bill creating the National Institute of Health, which contains three distinct features:

First. It creates the institute in the United States Public Health Service, under the administrative direction and control of the Surgeon General, for the special purpose of scientific research to ascertain the cause, prevention, and cure of diseases affecting human beings. It does not establish any new bureaus or commissions but utilizes existing Government machinery, provides for enlargement of the former Hygienic Laboratory, which came into existence in 1901 by congressional action, and appropriates $750,000 for the erection of an additional building.

Second. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to accept gifts for study, investigation, and research in problems relating to the health of man and matters pertaining thereto, with the provision that if gifts in the sum of half a million dollars or more are made, the name of the donor shall be perpetuated in a suitable way. This feature of the act is most unusual and important. No precedent can be recalled of donations from philanthropists to enable the Federal Government to maintain institutions for the purpose of research, with possibly two exceptions—the Smithsonian Institution and the Library of Congress. The Smithsonian was founded on the gift of $550,000 by James Smithson to disseminate knowledge among men. It stands as a monument to his name and its achievements are known throughout the world. The authorization granted to the Library of Congress to accept funds for special purposes has resulted in gifts to it exceeding $2,600,000.

Third. It proposes the establishment and maintenance in the institute out of funds donated for that purpose of a system of fellowships in scientific research to encourage and aid men and women of marked proficiency to combat the diseases that menace human health. This provision of the act is regarded as its outstanding feature, for these fellowships offer an opportunity to those especially qualified to serve their fellow men in the most useful of all ways. While it is contemplated that the bulk of research work will be carried on in the institute laboratories in Washington, it is not so limited. Under the terms of the act these fellows can be assigned to institutions in any part of the globe wherever the research problem may be undertaken most advantageously.

This institute marks the beginning of a new chapter in the history of medicine of a most far-reaching influence in the relief of human suffering. The act creating the institute is a veritable declaration of war against all the physical forces detrimental to health on a greater scale than ever before attempted. It centers in the Nation's Capital all the country's medical and scientific resources for combating disease and creates in Washington a clearing house of health for all the world.

Under a commander in chief—the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, with the director of the institute as his first lieutenant in active charge—will be marshaled the Nation's army of experts in the sciences of medicine, surgery, psychiatry, dentistry, chemistry, physics, radiology, biology, bacteriology, pharmacology, pharmacy, and allied professions in a concentrated drive to prevent disease by ascertaining its cause and applying preventive measures in advance of its outbreak.

In the National Capital has been founded an institution devoted solely to study, investigation, and research in problems relating to the health of man, where every available facility will be provided to aid and encourage scientists to combat sickness and solve the many remaining mysteries of disease, and where all knowledge and every advance in the promotion of human health will be pooled and correlated.

The plan of the institute is to make of it an immense cooperative scientific organization, in which leading experts in every branch of science connected with plant and animal life will be brought together and given opportunity to work in unison for the purpose of discovering all the laws of life. Harmonious cooperation—one for all and all for one—is the watchword of the institute.

In this institute will be carried on new researches in cancer on a greater scale than ever before attempted, new investigations into the cause and cure of infantile paralysis and heart diseases, new studies of the common cold, influenza, and pneumonia; here will be made new discoveries; new and better methods of cure and treatment will be found to replace those now in use; and new and greater safeguards of health in general will be devised.

Although truly remarkable advances have been made in the war for health by individual scientists, by private and governmental institutions, no agency has ever been founded on earth for combating disease on so comprehensive and cooperative a scale as the National Institute of Health. While it is impossible to predict its eventual benefits to humanity, they are certain to be very great.

Genuine cooperation in science is necessary if the best possible results are to be obtained. Dr. Treat Johnson, of Yale, said: "Nothing can be done, no attack can be made on any (health) problem, except through the principle of cooperation. * * * No one to-day can cover any single field in science individually and make progress. He must work in cooperation with others."

Until this institute was created there was no place in which radiologists could meet their brother workers in other branches of science in order to formulate better means of preventing and eradicating disease. Dr. Julius Stieglitz, of the University of Chicago, deplored the lack of peace-time cooperation among scientists in the field of health, pointing out that in time of national danger from war a great mobilization of scientists takes place in order to bring into existence destructive forces with which to fight the battles of men. In 1923 he said: "There is no institution in which the chemists of the United States can come together with the medical scientists to inaugurate a general attack upon the forces that kill. * * * Let there be another war, and no doubt the chemists will be mobilized again, but they will be mobilized to kill."

The National Institute of Health furnishes the means by which can best be put into practice the "principle of cooperation," described by Johnson as being so essential to the success of the research expert. It is the agency which Stieglitz had in mind—an institution where radiologists and chemists can work in friendly union with every other branch of science to solve health problems, giving the benefit of their vast store of knowledge in alleviating pain and preventing sickness.

This act provides radiology with the opportunity to render a priceless service to humanity. The institute enables it to bring into close cooperative effort with other sciences its research activities in a field that to-day comprises the most difficult and destructive of all unconquered diseases—cancer. Radiologists are devoting much time and attention to the study of this dread malady, which is causing untold suffering and death. While the span of life has been materially lengthened and the death rate in many diseases greatly reduced, cancer has not responded to scientific treatment, and its mortality rate has increased to alarming proportions. In 1850 approximately 30 people per hundred thousand died with cancer. In 1910 the figure had risen to 75, and in 1929 the fatalities from cancer had reached the appalling total of 115 per hundred thousand. In this great altruistic agency, which our Government has provided, you can bring into play, in connection with other sciences, all your skill and research ability to blot out this and other diseases.

Dr. Joseph Colt Bloodgood, one of America's ablest physicians and strongest believers in the merits of your science, who has devoted his great intellect to fighting cancer, and who is with us to-night, recently said: "No specialty in medical science and practice has developed more rapidly than radiology, both in its diagnostic and therapeutic aspects. * * * Radiology is now one of the greatest specialties in medicine. We owe a great debt of gratitude to the pioneers, many of whom have lost their lives because of their ignorance of how to protect themselves from irritation of X ray and radium. * * *" May I add that in my opinion no science is destined to play during the next half century a greater part than radiology in the world-wide battle with disease.

The institute stands sorely in need of added facilities with which to carry on its noble work. Only recently Surg. Gen. Hugh S. Cumming, of the United States Public Health Service, said: "* * * Probably the greatest immediate need of the National Institute of Health is the completion of its physical development, especially additional buildings to house a division of physics, where studies, especially of light and ventilation, as they affect the general health of the people, and of the use of X ray and radium in the treatment of disease, can be undertaken; and a division of physiology, the work of which is intimately concerned with every division of the institute. Other work which it is desired to take up as soon as funds and facilities are available are studies of arthritis, focal infections and their relation to chronic degenerative diseases, degenerative diseases of the arterial system, the common cold, puerperal fever, life cycles of bacteria, etc."

The 1931 report of the Twentieth Century Fund (Inc.), entitled "American Foundations and Their Fields," states: "Judged by the amount of money donated in 1930 (by 21 leading American foundations, exclusive of private benefactions) the field of medicine and public health is the most popular, a total of $18,627,222 in grants to it having been reported in the returns. More than one-third (35.5 per cent) of all funds given away by the foundations canvassed has gone into this field."

Of this liberal sum, $8,396,932, or 45.1 per cent, was paid in support of educational activities; $8,401,825, or 45.2 per cent, in support of social action; and only $1,828,458, or 9.7 per cent, in support of research.

This is very striking, and shows that while American philanthropists, as represented by the report quoted above, were quite generous last year in support of medicine and public health in a general way; less than 10 per cent of these sums were given to pure research, without which it is impossible to ascertain the cause and cure of disease. It is unfortunate that so little was donated last year by these 21 foundations to health research, but I have no doubt that individual benefactions for that purpose were considerable.

Recently an article appeared in Nation's Business, entitled, "My Money After I Die—By a Man Who Has Some." The author expressed an earnest desire to so dispose of his large wealth as to promote human happiness and make it continuously useful. Beyond question, suffering, sickness, and death will last until the end of time, and there is no surer way to make money continuously useful in promoting health and happiness than by liberally endowing the National Institute of Health.

Although the name and some of the facilities are new, the National Institute of Health has been a going concern for over 30 years, and has 155 persons hard at work every day on some phase of health investigation. It has been of tremendous aid to research in the world, and it is impossible to enumerate here even briefly the total of its accomplishments and contributions to science, yet a few points can be noted in connection with past and present work.

From the institute have come Doctor Goldberger's monumental work in the discovery of the cause and prevention of pellagra; Doctor Francis's work on tularemia; Doctor Spencer's work on spotted fever and his discovery of a protective vaccine; the discoveries of Doctors Dyer, Rumerich, and Badger of an eastern form of spotted fever, which may prove to be one of the most important public-health problems; Professor Voegtlin's fundamental work in the metabolism of normal and cancer cells; and Professor Hudson's contributions to work on the chemical structure of sugars.

At the present time, under the guidance of its director, Dr. G. W. McCoy, studies are in progress at the institute relating to nutrition, cancer, typhus-spotted fever, tularemia, infantile paralysis, undulant fever, spinal meningitis, ginger paralysis, standardization of certain drugs, fundamental researches on sugar, and many other problems. Lastly, through its work in the control and standardization of biologic products, the institute has rendered a very great service to the people of the United States in safeguarding the numerous serums and vaccines placed on the market, and a number of the biological standards worked out at the institute have been adopted by many foreign countries.

The advantages of having such an institution in the Government are apparent. It belongs to the people and is responsible to them. Their problems are its problems. It provides for continuity. Research work should not be taken up and dropped at the whim of some capricious benefactor or changing board of directors. It requires years of continuous application to a definite plan which Government conditions supply. Again, the checks and control of Government financial methods assure us that money allotted to this work, whether from private donations or appropriations by Congress, will be carefully accounted for and put to good use.

The past record of the Public Health Service indicates that it is the agency par excellence to lead in this great public-health movement and that Congress acted wisely in confiding to it the entire management and direction of the National Institute of Health. The service now has a large corps of trained personnel engaged in scientific investigations in many parts of the country, which can be most effectively used as a nucleus for developing the necessary organization to undertake the proposed researches in the institute.

Not only does the Public Health Service have in its ranks many experienced and scientific workers but it also has laboratory and other equipment that is being used to great advantage in research work. I can not say too much about the work of the United States Public Health Service, which for many years has aided the States in times of epidemic, has made exhaustive studies in health conditions, and, in general, has been a most important factor in reducing mortality in this country.

In conclusion, let me appeal to you and to all radiologists to devote your vigorous young intellects to the alleviation of human suffering. Your science can be of invaluable assistance to the National Institute of Health in making of it a truly great research institution, thereby fulfilling its noble destiny. Good health is the most precious of earthly blessings. Nothing can take its place. With it one can enjoy life amid great hardships. Without it vast wealth can not bring happiness. To attain this great blessing we should strive so earnestly that when our earthly careers are about to close each and everyone can say in the language of the immortal Pasteur, "I have done what I could."

RECAPTURE OF OUR EXPORT TRADE

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I wish to trespass upon the time of the Senate merely for a few moments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Nevada will proceed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, as chairman of a subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, I have gathered certain information with regard to the decrease of our export trade. I wish to say that, according to a report of the Department of Commerce, there was a decrease in our export trade between 1929 and 1930 of 12.1 per cent; from 1930—that is, from the end of the fiscal year July 1, 1930, to July 1, 1931—there was an additional decrease of 39.3 per cent; and since July 1, 1931, to this time the decrease has continued by over 17 per cent.

It would be interesting to compare certain items. Between 1929 and 1930 the export of unmanufactured cotton decreased 40 per cent. Between July, 1930, and July, 1931, the decrease of cotton exports was 58 per cent.

If we take wheat, we will find that by the end of the fiscal year July 1, 1930, wheat exports had decreased 40 per cent. They continued to decrease, so that by July 1, 1931, the decrease amounted to 59 per cent. Since that time the exports of wheat and cotton have both continued to decrease. We ordinarily export nearly 60 per cent of our cotton. When it is realized that in two years there has been a falling off of 70 per cent in export cotton it is apparent what it means.

In 1929 there were approximately 14,000,000 bales of cotton raised in the United States and a hold over of about 2,000,000 bales. In 1930 there were approximately 13,000,000 bales of cotton—I am using round numbers—produced in the United States, and there was a carry-over of between six and seven million bales. Of course, that accounts for the price of cotton being less than 6 cents a pound, and it accounts for the present low price of wheat. The schedule as given by the Department of Commerce shows these declines.

There has been no recommendation by the Department of Commerce or by the Government, or by anyone else so far as our committee has been able to discover, that offers any remedy whatever for the continued decrease in our export trade. There is no committee that has attempted to report on or to suggest any remedy with regard to this constant decrease in our export trade. As a matter of fact, when this vital question is raised, Mr. President, we are told that our export trade, on the average, is not over 10 per cent of our entire trade, the remainder being domestic trade; but the relation between our export trade and our domestic trade is apparent when it is realized that our domestic trade has fallen off, I should say, over 40 per cent during this time.

The condition is illustrated in this manner: The steel plants of the United States, according to their reports, are to-day operating at only 30 per cent of their operating capacity; other plants have had their operating capacity reduced to a similar extent. That is by reason, naturally, of the loss of demand not only in the foreign market but in the domestic market.

It is evident that the vast number of people of this country who are dependent upon the cotton industry for their prosperity can not obtain money with which to purchase manufactured goods, or anything else in the domestic market, with cotton below 6 cents a pound, because that price does not pay the expense of raising it. We find exactly the same thing in the case of wheat. Wheat at its present price will not pay the expense of raising it. The result is that the oversupply in our own market is to a great extent caused by the loss of our export trade. It becomes exceedingly valuable, therefore, to determine the cause of the loss of our export trade, and if there be any remedy that may be applied to overcome that situation, to endeavor to ascertain it and apply it.

That is a question which our subcommittee has been dealing with. The subcommittee finds as one of the chief causes of the decrease in our export market the low exchange rate existing in countries that formerly constituted some of our best export markets. We will take China for illustration. China has nothing but silver money. In China that kind of money passes at par as our silver dollar passes at par here. No matter what the price of silver is the Chinese get the same amount of their money for their labor, the same amount for their rice and other products. When, however, they start to buy our wheat or our lumber or our cotton or our automobiles the amount they have to pay in their money depends upon the exchange rates.

As we require them to pay in our money—in gold money—we place our exchange value on their silver money. We do not place it at par; we place it at the value of the silver in the coin, and when silver is only 30 cents an ounce and there being only seventy-eight one hundredths of an ounce in a dollar, we say, "Your dollar is worth 21 cents," which means that they have got to exchange nearly five of their dollars for one of our dollars with which to pay for our products. The result is that, instead of paying $20 a thousand for lumber, they are paying $90 a thousand for lumber; instead of paying $600 gold for a cheap automobile—and we are supplying 80 per cent of them—they are paying four and a half times $600, or $2,700 in their money, for an automobile. Of course our exporters get no more, but the Chinese have to pay four and a half times the value of their money in their own country for our goods; so far as they are concerned the cost is four and a half times our price. Those are the questions we are dealing with.

The same exchange problem now applies to countries such as Great Britain and other nations which have gone off the gold standard. Whenever money by comparison with gold is cheapened, whether it be fiat money or any other kind, it requires more of that money to purchase gold exchange or our gold with which to buy our products. On the other hand, wherever there is cheap money a dear money like gold will seek that market, because it will buy the cheap money with which to buy the products of the country where that cheap money is accepted at par.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the same thing the Senator has stated as applying to China and the Orient likewise applies to a certain extent to the South American countries, does it not?

Mr. PITTMAN. I was just going to say, sir, that it does not make any difference why the money of a country is cheap by comparison with gold; if it is cheap by comparison with gold, then the exchange difference between their money and our money reaches a point where they can not afford to buy our products. I have illustrated how that applies with regard to silver. That applies, as I say, in every country where they have nothing but silver money. I do not care whether they are nominally on the gold standard or not; the question is what kind of money the ultimate purchaser has with which to pay for our goods.

That, however, does not apply alone to the silver dollar. As I say, it applies to any country with cheap money; and when I say "cheap money," I mean by comparison with the value of gold.

To-day Great Britain's exchange, so far as we are concerned, is about $3.38, I believe.

Mr. SMOOT. Three forty.

Mr. PITTMAN. Three dollars and forty cents, the Senator from Utah says. It has been changing. It is $3.40 to-day, and yet on September 28 it was $4.68. In other words, the pound sterling could buy in this country $4.68 worth of our products at our price by exchanging it for our money on that ratio in September. To-day the same unit of money can only purchase $3.40 worth. Therefore it is more difficult for them to purchase from us; and that applies to all countries that have gone off the gold standard, or whose money has depreciated by comparison with gold, through the lack of sufficient gold reserve, or any other cause which affects the credit of the country.

That is one side of the matter. The other side of it is our export side.

We can not export in competition with Great Britain because other countries can exchange their money with the depreciated pound sterling to greater advantage than they can with our gold-standard money. The result of the situation is that Great Britain has a 25 or 30 per cent advantage of us in the markets of the world. Her factories are opening up. Her unemployment is disappearing. Her export trade is increasing by jumps and bounds, while our export trade is going down steadily to the disappearing point; and yet I have failed to hear a single, solitary expression from our Government on the subject except the bare announcement by the Department of Commerce as to how our exports are going down. I have heard no committee of Congress mention the condition or offer any suggestion whatsoever of remedy.

I have here certain facts, certain opinions, certain explanations, and certain suggested remedies which we have obtained through our committee. I admit, of course, that they touch these questions only partially. I do not think there is anyone that can cover them fully. The world situation is a complicated one, of course. The British Commission to the Far East in 1931, having an appropriation of £80,000, under Sir Ernest Thompson, and with a distinguished retinue, spent a whole year in the Orient in an effort to determine the cause of the falling off in the export trade of Great Britain to the Orient. They reported, of course, that the chief cause was the great difference in the exchange value of oriental money by comparison with gold. They offered a remedy. They stated that there was no possible way they could conceive of by which they could sell the products of their country to the Orient until they had raised the exchange value of the money of the Orient, or, in other words, the purchasing power of oriental money outside of its own country; and they recommended in no uncertain language that the British Government should take the lead in obtaining a conference of governments, because they said the only way that this problem could be settled was by intergovernmental conference.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senate passed a resolution last February, as I recall, directing the attention of the President to this situation, and asking him to call a conference of nations on the subject. Has that conference ever been called, or any reason given for not calling it?

Mr. PITTMAN. The conference has not been called by the President nor has any reason been given that I know of except that on June 2 or 3 a public telegram was addressed by the President of the United States to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in Salt Lake City, which in effect said, "I am now able to say to you that after an informal conference with various governments I find that there are governments whose participation I deem essential who are unwilling to participate in the conference at the present time." That is the last word I have heard on the subject.

I wish to say that I do not agree with the position taken by the President, although other Senators do. It was generally conceded at that time that the government referred to was the British Government. While it would be better if the British Government participated in a conference, I do not consider that an intergovernmental conference can not be successfully held without the participation of the British Government.

The British Government to-day is not so much interested in this question as is the United States. The British Government to-day, by reason of the depreciation of the value of its money, has 30 per cent, I should say, guessing at it roughly, the advantage of the United States in every foreign market where we may compete; and the farther the pound sterling falls with relation to gold the greater advantage they will have.

The United States to-day is suffering more than any other country in the world by reason of the disrupted exchange condition of the world. We merely have to look at our export market and our reports of a continuous falling almost to the disappearing point to realize it. We merely have to look at the fact that half of the corporations of the United States are in a position where they can hardly pay dividends. We merely have to look at the great steel plants of the country, which are the barometers of industry and prosperity, and note the fact that they are running on 30 per cent of operating capacity. Every time they have reduced their capacity they have discharged men, and every time they have discharged men they have added to the nonpurchasing population of this country and thus continued to destroy the domestic market through this vicious circle.

I think the time has come when it is the duty of this Government to invite all governments into a conference on this exchange matter. If Great Britain does not desire to enter such a conference, that is Great Britain's business. I venture to say, however, that if our Government were sitting around a table with Canada and Mexico and Central America and South America and Japan and Australia and China, attempting to reach some agreement with regard to exchange or intergovernmental commerce, Great Britain would be happy to sit in. When they talk about the proposition that without India nothing can be done with regard to the stabilization of the silver money of silver-using countries, it is cowardly, if not absurd.

India has used silver from time immemorial. India has been the hoarding place of silver for 4,000 years, and the silver does not come out of India. At the time when the British Government for India was melting up its silver-rupee coins and dumping them on the markets of the world so as to get gold to establish a gold standard, the people of India were still buying one-third, or approximately one-third, of the mine production of the silver of the world. Only a few days ago, when the British Government of India was again dumping silver to the amount of about 10,000,000 ounces derived from the melting up of circulating silver coins of India, at the same time the people of India purchased over 10,000,000 ounces of silver.

Sir George Shuster, the treasurer for India, in an attempt to bring about the gold standard, broke silver down from the nominal price of 60 cents an ounce to 25½ cents an ounce, and he only obtained $40,000,000 in gold of the $300,000,000 essential if the policy was going to be put into effect. He never even approached the gold standard. The policy thus pursued in that foolish act has depreciated the purchasing power of India over half. As some of the statesmen of Great Britain who know India better than Sir George Shuster contend, that act created more disturbance in India than any other cause.

If the governments of the world should agree to-day to stop the unnatural practice of debasing and melting up circulating silver coins which have circulated as money for thousands of years and dumping that metal on the markets of the world, we would get back to the natural law of supply and demand as it existed for years. When that happened we would get back to the natural price of silver; and when the natural price of silver is reached we will have our exchange right at the point under which our commerce in the past has flourished in the Orient.

But it is said, "What can we do unless the British Government for India will agree not to sell?" I say to you that if the United States and Mexico and South and Central America and Canada and Japan and China and Australia would agree not to melt up and debase silver coins in order to allow the metal to be sold and would agree to place an embargo upon the importation of silver from any country that was not a party to the agreement, India would not have anywhere to dump her silver coins, and she would become a party to the agreement.

Why, Mr. President, when it was stated the other day by a distinguished statesman of Great Britain—a former Chancellor of the Exchequer under the Conservative government, now a member of the House of Commons—Sir Robert Horne, that Great Britain should call an international conference and that she would have been better off if she had had a silver reserve as well as a gold reserve on hand, one of our great papers editorially laughed at the assertion.

Yet we have 468,000,000 standard silver dollars in our Treasury in reserve, and we have certificates circulating against it. That reserve, sir, prevented a revolution in India in 1918. When the British Government did not have the silver coins with which to redeem their paper, they could not find a reserve of silver anywhere in the world except this $468,000,000 of standard silver in our Treasury. They had to come here, and we had to get the Congress to pass an act to let us melt up 250,000,000 standard silver dollars and turn them over to Great Britain so that they could redeem their paper notes and prevent a revolution in India.

A reserve of silver is not an absurd thing. If every country in the world had a reserve of silver such as we have, a reserve against which paper certificates were in circulation, we would always know where the silver was. We would take it out of speculation, and we would have it as a safety valve when the gold of the world is cornered and hoarded, as it is cornered and hoarded to-day by two governments.

There is a dream by some of our financial advisers that we can put Great Britain back on a gold basis, and all the other countries of the world on a gold basis. It would be the best thing for us if we could do it; but how can we do it? We can not do it without giving them gold, and yet the United States and France have three-fourths of the monetary gold of the world. We can not afford to give it to them or lend it to them, nor can France do so. Yet you can imagine, if all of these countries went on a sound, economic gold basis, compared with what we require, how much gold they would have to have. We could not furnish it.

There is no desire on the part of our country to lower our standard. There is no desire on our part to go off the gold standard. Our gold standard is sound because we have nearly half the gold of the world. But if we expect to deal with the rest of the people of the world in commerce, we have to lower our standard of values, as Great Britain has done since September, 1928, or we will have to do something to raise the exchange value of the moneys of other countries whose basis of money is not gold. Yet there is not a move by our Government, by the administration, by any committee, by anyone except the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, to investigate the facts and suggest remedies.

It may be conservatively asserted that there is no record in all history of such universal monetary chaos, stagnation of trade and commerce, unemployment, underconsumption, and human distress. These deplorable conditions not only make brothers in suffering of all humanity but challenge the intense and immediate cooperation of the statesmanship and business genius of all countries.

Every government and every people have undoubtedly been striving to analyze the causes for such extraordinary conditions and, in a selfish way, to secure alleviation through hasty and temporary expedients. These selfish efforts of dazed and distracted statesmen and financiers, except in so far as they may have stemmed the tide of destruction, have been of little avail.

There has been no substantial attempt at international or intergovernmental cooperation for the analyzation of the fundamental causes that lie at the base of the trouble or the formulation and adoption of remedies for the solution of the problem. Ambition to maintain financial and commercial power and inherent distrust existing among peoples have so far discouraged and delayed intergovernmental cooperation.

Germany for years has been on the verge of bankruptcy, her Government constantly threatened with dissolution, and her unemployment increasing. Smaller governments throughout Europe have only been able to maintain themselves through the borrowing of gold. Their credit is now so low that further loans apparently are unsafe.

Great Britain's fall from power has probably been the most significant event in all the history of the present world depression. It was conceivable that the credit of many governments might be shaken, but not that of Great Britain. Great Britain had longer dominated the finances of the world and the commerce of the seas than had been the proud boast of any other country.

Great Britain on the 28th day of September was forced, after a stubborn and gallant fight, to abandon the gold standard and declare her inability to redeem her pound-sterling notes in gold. The world was amazed and shocked. The credit of Great Britain was shaken and the pound-sterling note commenced to fall. The credit systems of the world were rocked, money-exchange values were disrupted, and distrust in the stability of gold reserves and the power of governments to sustain their credits spread like a prairie fire. Gold withdrawals increased universally until a condition of panic was almost reached.

These things had their repercussion upon other peoples and other governments, and these governments, following the lead of Great Britain, abandoned the gold standard and their promise of gold redemption of their currency issues. Our Government was too well fortified with gold and natural resources to be vitally affected. Our banks, however, did for a time suffer large gold withdrawals through the unreasonable fear inspired by the conditions existing in Great Britain and other countries. This fear in the United States has been allayed. Our gold standard is safe. We have nearly half of the monetary gold of the world in our banks. Our credit stands unimpeached. The American dollar is at par and will remain at par.

The relief measures adopted by our Government have proven, in the circumstances, inadequate. The farmer has made no profits upon his crops, the manufacturers have been compelled to continuously reduce plant operations to meet the lessened purchasing power of former customers, and unemployment has steadily increased to the present date.

We are faced with a winter during which there must be inevitably great suffering. What plans are to be proposed by the President for the solution of our distressing problems? What action will Congress take to meet the emergency? These are matters of vital interest to the people of our country.

Congress is asked to approve the debt moratorium initiated by the President. Our bankers, who, after conference with the President, established a $500,000,000 pool to prevent further failures of banks whose vaults are full of frozen assets, desire a liberalization of the policy of the Federal reserve banks, and possibly a liberalization of the Federal reserve act in aid of the extension of credits by the banks of the country. It is being suggested by statesmen and financiers that it is essential for Congress to enlarge the resources and expand the credit of the farm-loan banks. The advice even comes from high governmental sources that it will be necessary for the Congress to create another financial institution to be backed by the Federal Government in aid of home builders. These acts it is true, will delay bankruptcy, but on the other hand they will add to the burdens of the taxpayer without increasing the value of his property or his products.

It appears that, notwithstanding these conflicting opinions, the National Government will be compelled to come to the assistance of industry and of labor lest failures increase and unemployment multiply. The only alternative apparently is action that will increase the purchasing power of our citizens and our foreign customers.

The proposal for the curtailment of production does not, in my opinion, offer any permanent remedy for the loss of purchasing power by our customers. The great manufacturing plants of our country have for two years been steadily reducing plant operations. This may have resulted in less loss to the manufacturing industry, but at the same time it has inevitably and constantly added to the mass of unemployed of the country and to the reduction of the purchasing power in the domestic market.

If the farmers of the country curtailed production, then they will reduce the number of their employees and add further to the horde of unemployed in the country. In what position are plants, whether they be manufacturing or agricultural plants, to make profits or even to pay increased taxes upon such investments when only operating to a small portion of their capacity? Such a proposition is fundamentally unsound.

The stagnation of trade is the chief cause of world depression. Many able economists declare that the scarcity and maldistribution of gold is the principal cause for the stagnation of trade and commerce. It is contended that the annual mine supply of gold has not kept pace with the increase of population and trade throughout the world, and that this scarcity of gold has caused governments to contrive to obtain, horde, and keep it, which has resulted in a maldistribution of the metal. These arguments are all based upon facts, which may and probably do constitute substantial causes for world depression.

The financial committee of the League of Nations found these facts to be true, as has also the MacMillan report, recently published in Great Britain. And yet it must be evident that the maldistribution of gold, and even the effect of its scarcity, would have been largely overcome and may not have been seriously felt for years if the trade and commerce of the world had not been obstructed, and had moved smoothly through its former channels. Great Britain undoubtedly could have maintained her gold reserve and not have been compelled to go off the gold standard had not the balance of trade gone against her through the disastrous slump in her export trade. The stagnation of world trade is more responsible for world depression, in my opinion, than any other cause.

Let us view our own export trade. And certainly, with our skilled labor, machinery, and mass production, we should be capable of competing anywhere in the world. The recent report of our Department of Commerce discloses that our exports from June 30, 1929, to June 30, 1930, decreased 12.7 per cent, and that such exports from June 30, 1930, to October, 1931, had further decreased 39.3 per cent. There has been a continuous and disastrous decrease in our export trade since 1928.

It has been urged, however, most seriously by some of our financiers that only about 10 per cent of our production is exported, and that we rely upon our large and luxurious domestic trade. But something has happened to our domestic trade. Let us consider the fate of cotton, our largest export commodity. In the year ending June 30, 1929, the United States exported unmanufactured cotton of the value of $868,200,000. In the year ending June 30, 1931, we exported unmanufactured cotton of the value of $424,600,000. From 1929 to 1930 there was a decrease in exports of 22.7 per cent. From 1930 to 1931 there was a further decrease of 55 per cent. In 1929 the average price of cotton was 23 cents a pound. At the present time the price of cotton is below 7 cents a pound, being a decrease of 70 per cent in the price of cotton in the last two years.

In the year ending July 31, 1929, we produced 14,297,000 bales of cotton, with a carry-over of 2,312,000 bales as of July 31. In the year ending July 31, 1931, we produced 13,756,000 bales of cotton, with a carry-over of 6,369,000 bales as of July 31. Normally about half of the total production of American cotton is exported.

What was the result of this? The cotton planter had more cotton than he could dispose of in the domestic market. He had to have gold to pay his debts. He was compelled to sell in a market where there was a greater supply than a demand. The result was natural. The price of cotton was thus beaten down from 23 cents a pound in 1929 to below 7 cents a pound at the present time. Seven cents a pound will not pay the expense of raising cotton. The result was that those engaged in the cotton industry could not pay their obligations or even their taxes. They had no money with which to purchase automobiles, radios, clothing, and other manufactured articles. The people of the cotton-raising section of the country became nonpurchasers in the domestic market.

The same conditions extend to lumber, wheat, meats, and many other articles. Exports of such commodities from 1930 to 1931 decreased from 40 to 55 per cent. The prices of such commodities have also suffered a similar decrease. The producers of such commodities are in the same situation as those dependent upon the production of cotton. They have made no profits and have no money with which to purchase manufactured articles. And so domestic purchasers of our manufactured articles have decreased from 25 to 50 per cent since 1929. The result of such reduced purchasing power is illustrated by the fact that the great steel plants of our country are operating at only 30 per cent of their capacity.

And this was not the end of the destruction of the purchasing power of the people in the domestic market. With reduced purchases by the domestic consumers plant operations were reduced, and as plant operations were reduced employees were discharged to be added to the ever-increasing horde of unemployed nonpurchasers. And so with each curtailment in plant operation the domestic purchasing power decreased and thus necessitated further reduction of plant operation. And how will we escape from this vicious circle?

The logic of the situation leads directly to the conclusion that our domestic market is dependent for its prosperity upon our export market. The purchasing power of our citizens can not be increased materially until they can sell their normal production at a profit.

Disruption of exchange is the major cause for the sudden and extreme decrease in the export trade of the United States, Great Britain, and other gold-standard countries.

When we export goods to a foreign country such goods are paid for at our price in our money. The foreign buyer, to consummate the purchase, must exchange the money of his country for our money, with which to pay for our exports.

There are only three kinds of money in the world, namely, gold, silver, and fiat paper money. Of course, paper currency based upon gold and silver is treated as a part of the gold and silver money of countries. Fiat money is paper currency not secured by or convertible into gold or silver, and is dependent for its value solely upon the promise to pay and the credit of the government or bank of issuance. We, as all other gold-standard countries, measure the value of silver money and of fiat money by comparison with the value we place upon our gold money.

In September we valued the British pound sterling at $4.86. At that time the pound sterling exchanged for $4.86 of our money. Now Great Britain is off the gold standard and its pound-sterling note is not convertible into gold. Its value is dependent entirely upon the credit of Great Britain and the hope that it will eventually redeem such note at par; that is, at the exchange value of $4.86. The exchange value of the pound sterling has fallen to $3.40, and may suffer a further depreciation.

In 1928, when silver was around 60 cents an ounce, the exchange value of the Chinese silver dollar, measured by our money, was approximately 50 cents. It then required two Chinese silver dollars to purchase one of our dollars with which to pay for our products. To-day the exchange value of the Chinese silver dollar, by reason of the decrease in the price of silver to around 30 cents an ounce, is about 21 cents. In other words, to-day, by reason of the fall in Chinese exchange, it takes nearly four and one-half Chinese silver dollars to exchange for one of our dollars with which to pay for our exports.

The first money exchange that was disrupted was the money of those countries where silver is and for many ages has been the exclusive circulating medium. This disruption of exchange commenced with the sudden fall in the price and value of silver along in 1928, which continued until the present time. The effect of this disruption of exchange may best be illustrated by a review of the history of our trade with China since the fiscal year of 1928. From that time until the present our exports to China have steadily decreased at an alarming rate and are rapidly approaching the disappearing point.

It may be argued, of course, that this abnormal and extreme decrease in our exports to China is due to the impoverishment of the people of China through wars, floods, and other catastrophes. I recently spent six weeks in China by direction of the United States Senate studying conditions there as affecting our commerce and trade. I was astonished to find that the great cities along the coast of China were enjoying extraordinary prosperity. The so-called banditry wars were in remote provinces involving an area small indeed by comparison with China, which in area is almost as large as the United States and Mexico combined. I heard nothing of poverty or unemployment in these large cities.

I had the honor to address a large gathering of business men of various nationalities in Hong Kong, China. When I had completed my speech a British importer asked me if I believed that the fall in the price of silver, and the consequent lowering of Chinese exchange, was responsible for the falling off of the exports from the British Isles. I read to the meeting, in reply to this inquiry, a statement contained in the recent report of the British Economic Mission of the Far East, in which it was stated that in 1929 Great Britain exported to China 210,000,000 of linear yards of cotton piece goods, while in 1930 such exports had decreased to the amazing extent of only 64,000,000 of linear yards of such cotton piece goods. And may I not at this time call attention to the fact that it was such decreases in the export of British manufactured goods to China and other silver-money using countries that resulted in a balance of trade against her, the reduction of operations in her plants, the decrease in the purchase of raw material from our country, the discharge of employees, permanent unemployment, the dole, and the abandonment of the gold standard.

A distinguished Chinese banker then followed the British interrogator. He had been educated in the United States. He spoke English fluently. He had obtained his banking experience in one of our large banking institutions. He said: "Senator, I agree with you that the sudden and extreme decrease in the price of silver, which has resulted in the low exchange value of our silver money, is due exclusively to the policy and practice of the British Government for India, put in effect in 1928, in melting up silver rupee coins and dumping the metal upon the market of the world.

"I agree also," he said, "as to the destructive effect of the low rate of exchange upon your exports and the exports of Great Britain and other gold-standard countries to China. Here in China," he declared, "we have nothing but silver money and currency based upon silver money. To us gold is only jewelry. Our silver dollar has as much silver in it as your silver dollar. Your silver dollar in the United States passes at par, or its face value, and so does our silver dollar pass at par, or its face value, in China. We receive the same number of silver dollars for our labor and our products that we did when silver was twice the price it is to-day. You refuse to accept our silver dollar in exchange for your dollar at par, or its face value. You will only accept our silver money in exchange for your money with which to pay for your goods at the value of the silver in our dollar. As there are only about seventy-eight hundredths of an ounce of silver in a dollar, and the price of silver in the markets of the world being only 30 cents an ounce, you value our silver dollar in exchange for your dollar at only 23 cents. That means," he asserted, "that we must exchange nearly five of our silver dollars for one of your dollars with which to pay your price for your goods. In the circumstances," the speaker said, "we can not afford to buy your goods, and we are not buying them except in so far as necessity requires. I do not agree with you, Senator, that this is a bad thing for China. It has brought prosperity to China. It compels our people to buy at home. This domestic buying," he asserted. "has drawn gold to China from your country, Japan, Great Britain, and other gold-basis countries, to exchange for our cheaper silver with which to employ our cheap labor to build cotton mills, cigarette factories, flour mills, hotels, apartment houses, and to engage in other industries to domestically supply the demands of our people. This is the cause," said he, "for the building boom and the prosperity that you observe in all the large coastal cities of China."

This speech of the distinguished Chinese banker illustrates the effect of disruption of exchange upon our exports not only to China but Asia, South America, Mexico, and other silver money using countries. The question is not material as to whether the country to which we export is on a nominal gold standard, but whether the ultimate purchaser of our export goods has to pay for them in silver or other depreciated money.

The customs tariff of China adds to the difficulty of the disrupted exchange. China now has tariff autonomy. The tariff duties were originally based upon silver. These revenues were allocated substantially to the payment of foreign-service debts. In view of the low exchange rate of silver money such revenues were insufficient to meet the requirements of foreign debt service. The Government, therefore, placed the tariff duties on a gold-unit basis; that is, if a duty was 40 cents on the specific article, the importer would be required to pay silver in an amount that would exchange for 40 cents gold. At the rate of exchange now prevailing that would require about $1.80 in Chinese silver money. So the tariff through this process was increased four and one-half times to the Chinese importer.

The extent and effect of the disruption of the exchange value of silver money can only be estimated when we realize that over half of the people of the world have from time immemorial had no other circulating medium than silver coins, or paper convertible into silver, and that to-day 90 per cent of the governments of the world are without a gold standard, or the possibility of obtaining gold for circulation, or as a reserve for currency issue. Practically three-fourths of the monetary gold of the world is lying dormant in the banks of the United States and France. When Great Britain could not obtain sufficient gold to maintain a gold standard, it is futile at the present time to nurse the hopeless ambition of placing the rest of the world on a gold standard, or of even adequately maintaining the gold standard of those countries which are now so desperately and tenaciously holding on.

We think of silver as only a commodity. As a fact, only one-fifth of the silver produced is used in the arts and sciences, the balance being used for monetary purposes. Silver is money to over half of the people of the world. They are interested in the price of silver solely to the extent that it affects the exchange value of their money. Gold-standard governments protect their gold through embargoes and various devices. Silver money using people are entitled to protection against dumping and other acts destructive of the value of their money. It is to our interest to cooperate with them in obtaining such protection. They are our largest potential foreign customers.

It would not be sound finance in present conditions for us to abandon the gold standard or to reduce even the comparative exchange value of our money. We can do nothing to raise the exchange value of fiat money. We can, through initiative and cooperation with other governments, readily and easily raise the exchange value of silver money. Such action does not require a radical change in the monetary systems of the world; at least such is not the desire or intention of the subcommittee of which I am chairman, nor, to my knowledge, of the United States Senate.

In February, 1930, the Senate of the United States unanimously adopted a resolution that I introduced on behalf of the committee. This resolution simply states:

Resolved, That the Senate, having had under investigation and consideration, through its Committee on Foreign Relations and a subcommittee thereof, our commercial relations with China, the causes of the great and sudden depression in such commerce, and remedies for such depression, and such committee having reported to the Senate, the Senate submits to the President the reports, hearings, and other data in respect thereto, with the respectful suggestion that he shall, if he deem it compatible with the best interests of the Government, enter into discussion or negotiation with governments looking to the suspension of the policy and practice of governments of melting up or debasing silver coins and sales by governments of silver, and that he take such other and further action in the premises as he may deem necessary to eliminate the abnormal fluctuations and depressions in the price of silver.

The Senate further respectfully suggests that the President, if he deem it compatible with the best interests of the Government, call or obtain an international conference, or international conferences, to the end that agreements or understandings may be obtained with respect to the uses and status of silver as money.

This resolution was indorsed by legislative action of 11 Western States. The calling of the conference was approved by the International Chamber of Commerce, the Pan American Conference, the American Chamber of Commerce of China, the Pacific Foreign Trade Council, and the American Federation of Labor.

Our committee favors no artificial price-fixing scheme. The chief object of the conference is to have governments agree to abandon or suspend the policy and practice of debasing and melting up silver coins and thus oversupplying the market with this metal. If this one agreement could be executed, the price of silver would be restored almost instantly to its normal price of around 60 or 65 cents an ounce. I realize that this will have the sound of a dogmatic expression, and yet the facts will sustain it.

The price of silver for 20 years, until the dumping commenced from India, fluctuated around 60 cents an ounce. What caused the sudden, extreme depression in the price? It certainly was not caused by an oversupply from mine production throughout the world. The world mine production of silver for 1930 was only 243,700,000 ounces, being 6½ per cent less than the mine production of 1929. The world mine production for 1931, based upon estimates of monthly production, will only be 178,000,000 ounces, a decrease of 26½ per cent since 1930. The world production of silver for 1913 was 223,686,823 ounces, being 20 per cent greater than the mine production of 1931.

So it is evident that the sudden, abnormal, and extreme decrease in the price of silver was not due to an oversupply coming from mine production. What, then, was the cause of the oversupply? In 1924 the British Government instituted the practice of debasing its silver coins and selling its surplus upon the market of the world. These sales increased until and through 1929, totaling 26,400,000 ounces.

In 1927, 1928, and 1929 France, Belgium, and Indo-China demonetized, melted up, and sold silver coins to the total amount of 62,000,000 ounces.

The British Government for India in 1926 adopted the gold-standard policy for India. Carrying out this policy contemplated the acquisition of approximately $300,000,000 in gold through the melting up of India rupee silver coins and the sale in the world's market of the bullion so derived. Under this policy the British Government for India dumped on the market of the world the following silver: 1927 and 1928, 31,700,000 ounces; 1929, 25,000,000 ounces; 1930, 29,500,000 ounces. In 1931 India continued to sell such silver, although the price had been beaten down from 57 cents to below 32 cents an ounce.

The world's production of silver during the last decade has averaged around 250,000,000 ounces annually. The steady and small increase in the production of silver was only sufficient to meet the increased demand caused by increased population and trade. Until the dumping from the countries mentioned commenced, while there was ample silver for market demands, there was no surplus. The dumping of such huge amounts of silver on the market of the world from unnatural sources had a tremendous bear effect. The threat of further dumping of unlimited amounts of silver from the same sources without regard to price had an even greater depressing effect upon the market for silver. The Indian Government to-day has in its treasury over 400,000,000 ounces of silver in the form of silver rupee coins that it is authorized to sell in any quantities, at any price, at any time. Until there is some assurance against this dumping by intergovernmental agreement it will be impossible for the price of silver to recover or for normal exchange to be restored.

There is a strange misconception as to the deposition and production and consumption of silver. Two-thirds of the silver produced in the world is as a by-product of gold, copper, lead, and zinc. The production of gold is decreasing. The production of silver is automatically controlled by the production of other metals. When times are prosperous and there is a demand for copper, lead, and zinc, there is also a demand for more silver, and when demand for these base metals decreases so does the supply of silver decrease.

The relative production of gold and silver since the discovery of America is discussed in Economic Paper No. 8, by the Bureau of Mines of the United States Department of Commerce, in a publication entitled "Summarized Data of Silver Production." I quote from a statement on page 7 which will undoubtedly enlighten, if not surprise, those who imagine that silver is not a precious metal and that from some unknown or imaginary source the world may be flooded with it. Here is the statement:

One-half of all the output of silver since 1493 was produced in the 39 years between 1889 and 1927, but in spite of this great increase its rate has been much less than that of gold, copper, lead, and zinc. The low rate of increase in silver production results from the fact that the silver-mining industry was developed on a basis of large-scale production earlier than the mining of other metals and from the lower price commanded by silver since it was demonetized in most countries. The rejection of silver as a basis of monetary systems in conjunction with gold terminated an association that had lasted for centuries.

Demonetization became possible through the enormous increase in gold production that followed invention of the cyanide process in 1887 and development of the gold fields of South Africa, yet a number of countries still retain the silver-gold standard. Most orientals use silver as a medium of exchange almost to the exclusion of gold. Silver may thus be regarded as a second line of defense for the maintenance of the metallic foundation of monetary systems, but the future of its production will be influenced largely by the course of gold production.

In conclusion, it is of interest to note that although the value of gold to silver now stands at a ratio of about 40 to 1 and was formerly fixed in the bimetallic monetary standard at 16 to 1, the ratio of production of silver to gold in the whole period since the discovery of America has been about 14 to 1.

At the time this article was written silver was at a higher price than it is to-day, so the statement of the ratio of 40 to 1 was accurate. To-day, with silver around 30 cents an ounce, the ratio is over 60 to 1.

A fear seems to exist in the minds of some that if the price of silver was restored the horded silver in India would come out of hiding and flood the market and again beat the price down. Statistics give no grounds for such fear. The world's price of silver in 1918 averaged $1.04 an ounce; in 1919, $1.25; and in 1920, $1.34. This unusually high price of silver did not cause the dumping of silver by India during those three years. India imported 333,970,299 ounces of silver, while during the same period she only exported 29,811,133 ounces. During the same period of time China imported, over and above exports, more than one-third of the total world production of silver.

It is also contended that the increased price of silver would increase production and thereby again beat down the price of silver. Statistics do not sustain this contention. During the same period of time, when silver was at the highest price that had been reached since 1841, the mine production of the world was hardly affected. According to the report of the Director of the Mint, from which all these figures are taken, during these years world production was as follows: In 1918, 203,000,000 ounces; in 1919, 179,000,000 ounces; and in 1920, 173,000,000 ounces. I have omitted the figures except those dealing in millions. This is due to the fact undoubtedly that the production of silver is chiefly as a by-product of gold, copper, lead, and zinc, and during that period there was no excessive demand for those metals. This also illustrates the automatic control of the production of silver that I have before referred to.

It is significant that during the recent rise in the price of silver our exports to China were greatly increased. This was but natural, because the exchange rate rose with the rise in silver, and China could buy more of our products with the same number of Chinese dollars.

It will also be recalled that during the high price of silver in 1918, 1919, and 1920 our export trade with China flourished. That was due, of course, to the fact that with silver at $1.34 an ounce Chinese exchange was at par; that is, the Chinese dollar was exchanged for one of our dollars with which to buy our goods.

A distinguished professor of one of our great universities recently stated that the fall in the price of silver had nothing to do with the decrease in our exports, and in sustaining this pronouncement he called attention to the fact that our exports to Europe had fallen off to the same extent as those to China. It did not occur to him that the loss of the export trade of Great Britain and other European countries to China and other silver money-using countries in manufactured goods had decreased their demand for our raw materials, which chiefly accounts for the decrease in our exports to Europe.

Sir Robert Horne is sustained by the report of the British Economic Mission to the Far East for 1930–31, as I have stated. This mission was headed by Sir Ernest Thompson, J. P., as chairman, and consisted of a group of distinguished economists and financiers of Great Britain. The mission spent several months in China and submitted an able and exhaustive report. I quote from the report at page 127. The statement is as follows:

> It is clear that the Chinese Government and the Chinese nation have set their faces toward a policy of industrializing China. In this development British capital should play its part and no restraint should be placed upon it.
> The continued depreciation of the value of silver has enormously reduced the purchasing power of China and, if it continues, will hasten the growth of industries in China, the manufactures of which will compete with imported products from Great Britain. Reduction in the value of silver also increases the difficulties of China in meeting interest on foreign loans and so compels her to raise further revenue by increasing import duties. If the depreciation of silver were to affect the foreign loan service, much damage would be inflicted on British interests.
> In our opinion, every means should be sought of bringing about the stabilization of silver and so of restoring to China her full purchasing power. Only by international agreement can this result be attained, and we feel that Great Britain should take a leading part in endeavoring to secure such agreement.

Our Government has no intention of debasing or melting up our silver coins. No government at the present time is pursuing such a practice, unless it be India, and the threat comes from India alone at the present time. Only an intergovernmental agreement, however, would insure against the adoption of such a practice at any time by any government. It certainly could not be injurious to our Government if other governments of the world maintain silver reserves. Silver money is undoubtedly more stable than fiat money. An agreement as to the issue and fineness of fractional silver coins would undoubtedly facilitate the exchange of such coins, and in any event would in no way adversely affect our monetary system. An agreement as to the exchange value of silver money in settlement of trade balances with silver-standard countries would at least remove some of the uncertainty in exchange values and eliminate one of the chief causes militating against credit transactions between countries where there are violent exchange fluctuations.

These are some of the subjects that could be discussed and considered, and upon which agreements might be reached under the terms of the Senate resolution for subsequent ratification, modification, or rejection by the participating governments.

The exchange problem to-day more vitally affects the United States than any other country. The abandonment by Great Britain and many other countries of the gold standard, and the consequent depreciation of their money by relation to gold, has given such countries a great advantage over the United States in the markets of the world. It has not yet been suggested how we may compete in the export trade with such countries. As it is not practical for us to depreciate the value of our money, it is of vital interest to us that the exchange value of the money of other countries be raised to par, or as nearly to par as may be possible.

What the world requires most is certainty as to the action of governments.

There is no doubt that every government in the world, unless they be the Governments of the United States and France, desires an international conference under the limitations of the Senate resolution, and many of them would be prepared to call the conference if they were assured that it would be agreeable to the United States Government and that our Government would participate. They feel that this matter has been initiated by the United States by the Senate resolution and that the President has already instituted action thereunder by informal conferences with other governments. They naturally hesitate until there is some action by our Government or some expression from our President.

The Under Secretary of State has officially and publicly announced that our Government is of the opinion that some other government more interested should take the initiative and issue the call for an intergovernmental conference on the silver problem and that the United States would participate in such conference upon invitation. I know of no other government to whom export trade is more vital, unless it be Great Britain.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator is aware of the fact that a statement was issued after the visit of Laval, the French statesman, that an agreement had been reached with the President of the United States that the Government of the United States would do everything to assist France to maintain the gold standard.

Mr. PITTMAN. I remember the joint statement. It seemed to me that it was an agreement on behalf of the President and Mr. Laval that their Governments were determined to maintain the gold standard, and I think they can maintain it; I do not think there is any question about it.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Assuming the truthfulness of all the Senator has said, what does he propose to remedy the situation? I know the Senator has been a great student of the question. What is his solution of the problem?

Mr. PITTMAN. In the first place, Mr. President, silver fluctuated around 60 cents an ounce for many years. It would be up a little and down a little; but the fluctuation was not so great as to interfere with trade transactions.

All of a sudden, a little over two years ago, it commenced to drop and drop, and it dropped from around 60 to around 25½ cents an ounce. We were told that that was on account of an oversupply. That is correct. It was not overproduction but was oversupply, because the production of silver from mines was less in 1930 than it was in 1929. It is less in 1931 than it was in 1930. In fact, it is less in 1931 than it was before the war, in 1913. It was not due to an overproduction from the mines.

Then we sought to find out the reason. In 1926 the British Government adopted a policy of putting India on a gold basis. That practice was not put into force and effect until 1928, because there was considerable protest against it in Great Britain. As a matter of fact, the governor of the Bank of England opposed it bitterly, said that it was impracticable and would not work. So they delayed it until 1928, and then Sir George Shuster, the treasurer for India, having been given absolute power to melt up and sell the silver coins in India at any time, at any price, in any quantity, commenced to melt them up and dump them on the markets of the world. He wanted to get $300,000,000 in gold. He had probably several hundred millions of ounces of silver in his possession as silver coin. He figured that at 60 cents an ounce he would not have to sell over 600,000,000 ounces. But he was ignorant, as unfortunately many economists are, of the effect of supply and demand on the market. He did not realize that silver had been used since the beginning of time. He did not understand that the supply of silver had been uniform throughout the ages, increasing only enough to meet increase of population and demands of business. The supply had never been short, but never was there a surplus. He did not understand that. So he dumped 158,000,000 ounces in two years' time. It was absorbed, of course, at bargain prices, but the price was pushed down.

That was not all. China and Persia joined in the dumping. In 1927, 1928, and 1929 the British Government being hard up for gold wanted to get some more gold, Belgium wanted some more gold, and France wanted some more gold. So they started debasing their coin; that is, they would take the silver coin, made of fine silver, and take the silver out and put nickle or something else in the place of it and dump that silver on the market.

Therefore, when we get down to it, there was only one thing which disturbed the natural law of supply and demand which had governed the supply of silver, and that was the unnatural dumping from the sources I have named.

Germany and other governments are coining silver coin, but India even now is melting up its silver coin and dumping the silver on the markets of the world, although their hope of returning to a gold standard is certainly far in the future.

It is asked, what will be accomplished by such a conference as is contemplated? I say, if we do not accomplish anything else, if the governments of the world should enter into a treaty simply saying that we will abandon the practice and policy of debasing and melting our silver coin, or if they do not go that far, but say they will suspend it for five years, the result will be that the law of supply and demand, which has been known through the ages, will be restored, and the natural price of silver, governed by that, would go back to 60 cents an ounce, where it was for years and years.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am much interested in what the Senator is saying. I infer from his remarks that he is advocating an international arrangement or conference. Let me ask the Senator a very practical question, as to whether or not he believes England and France would join in a conference of that kind, and whether or not, if they did not join, such a conference would be helpful.

Mr. PITTMAN. As to whether Great Britain would enter, the London Times for three months has been publishing two columns almost daily of expressions of opinion on that very subject.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I did not catch the question of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. PITTMAN. The question was whether Great Britain would participate in an international conference. Let us see what the business men of England who favor this say.

Sir Henri Deterding has been writing articles, and I daresay the Senator from Indiana has been getting copies of his articles. He has written several of them, and has stated, as I state, that the manufacturing concerns and business concerns of England could not sell at all to the oriental countries with the great difference in exchange value based on the price of silver. Sir Henri Deterding is the head of the Shell Oil Co.

Sir Hugo Cunliffe-Owen, who is the head of the British Tobacco Trust, takes the same view. Mr. Amery, of the House of Commons, one of the greatest financial experts, takes the same view. I could name 50 such men who take that view.

The question is whether or not that type of mind and business man is going to convince the British Government of the advisability of such a conference.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, is it not true that the decrease in the value of the pound sterling has cut the salaries, the wages, and the cost of manufacturing in Great Britain so that they can get down to the silver basis of the Orient?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know, Senator, whether it has or not. It may have or it may not have.

Mr. KEAN. It is 33 per cent off.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes. It amounts to the same thing, because they are paid in cheap money. It may or it may not have reached the level of exchange with oriental countries so that they can do business with them. I am afraid it has; and if it has, then we need not expect any assistance from Great Britain.

I say to the Senate as I said before, because Great Britain has lowered her money toward the standard of the oriental countries and will not join us and raise their standard, does not mean that we should in a cowardly way stand idly by and say we can not do anything without Great Britain.

I have already said that all of South America, Mexico, China, Japan, Australia, and Canada want to raise the standard of the purchasing power of their people. They want an international conference. If Great Britain does not want it, and France does not want it, let them stay out, and let those who join agree as among themselves, by treaty, that they will not debase their silver coins and will not permit importations of silver from any country that does not enter into that agreement. That would block Great Britain and France and India in one minute after such an agreement was entered into.

Another thing: If we can enter into an agreement with those countries as to certain reserves, as to the issue of certain paper money based on silver reserves and secured possibly to some extent by gold, if we can agree that this money shall have a certain exchange ratio for the purpose of settling trade balances, then we will reestablish our trade among those countries and will leave France and England on the outside.

These are suggestions, and whether they be founded in good economics or not, the fact remains that there is only one way to do it, and that is by intergovernmental conferences with the people with whom we may desire to do business. If we are to sit idly by and let Great Britain take the trade of the world from us—and I agree with the Senator that she is doing it, because she will not join us in helping to get back our trade—then it is all the more important that we should act on our own initiative in conjunction with the governments which will, and we should not hesitate to do it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As a matter of fact, the main purposes of those governments, 14 of them in number, in having gone off the gold standard, is to restore trade. Their trade was blocked, and they could not buy or sell. They could not sell, because they could not buy. They could not buy for lack of a medium with which to make international settlements. Under the gold standard, having no gold and having exhausted their borrowing power for gold, they were unable to obtain any medium with which to make international settlements. Partly as a result of this we have a world blockade of commerce. Having gone off the gold standard and making settlement by other means, they are able now to continue to trade with nations who are willing to accept another medium of exchange for international settlement.

Gold is merely a medium upon which to make international settlements. Not having it, they can not trade. They must find some other means in which to make settlements. The main purpose of trade is to exchange goods, and in the absence of any medium upon which to make settlement trade ceases. If that theory is accepted, it is quite conceivable that those 14 nations who are willing to make settlement on a different basis than that of gold, which they have not got, can now make an agreement for settlement in the terms of another medium and restore trade, leaving the gold-standard countries, who have a disadvantage of 20 or 30 per cent, to trade among themselves.

The Midland Bank of England reports in its last quarterly bulletin that it is possible England will not go back to the gold standard. The Government of Sweden may not ever go back to the gold standard, because they are able to trade now with other nations. Sir John Maynard Keynes says it is quite likely the gold-standard countires "will now suffer the curse of Midas."

Josepm Caillaux, the French statesman who put France back upon her feet financially after the war, expresses great concern for the safety and prosperity of French industry as a result of all these nations going off the gold standard. He said that the monetary systems of the world based on gold can be compared to an inverted cylinder of paper resting on a fine point of gold. He said that if we disturb that fine point even a little bit, the whole edifice trembles, and he said, "What a wonderful opportunity that gives to speculators." Then he went on to say that there is in his opinion only one remedy. He points to the economic advice or report of the economic council of the League of Nations who have advised that all the gold from all the countries of the world shall be gathered and concentrated in the Bank for International Settlements and shall be used only as a medium for making international settlements, a kind of bookkeeping or money-of-account method of settlement. He ridicules that suggestion. He says there is only one remedy and that is to add silver to the gold standard of the world and thus broaden the bases of the currency pyramid and to provide an additional medium of exchange for international settlement.

I ought also to add that the view of the economists and a large number of bankers is that on account of the tremendous indebtedness of the world incurred during the war and since, it is impossible to make payment or settlement in a commodity that is so rare as gold. Those who disagree have referred to silver as not being the proper medium for money, because they say silver is merely a commodity like any other commodity. I would like to be informed whether or not gold is not a commodity. Gold having been selected as the only commodity that can be used for the payment of debts or international settlements, with its scarcity and with the huge amount of debts to be settled for, that advantage given to gold over any other commodity creates a tremendous demand for gold. The greater the amount of debt, the greater the demand for gold. Gold, like any other commodity, yields to the law of supply and demand. Having this tremendous demand for gold, the value of gold increases, and as the value of gold increases the value of other commodities decreases.

I thought, in addition to the very excellent statement the Senator from Nevada has made, that I ought to make that statement and also say that it is quite generally agreed by responsible economists of the world that as a result of the scarcity of and great demand for gold we have the descending price level which is destroying commerce, values, incomes of individuals, and therefore the revenues of governments.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thank the Senator for the very able remarks he has made upon the subject. The Senator is a member of the Subcommittee on Foreign Relations, together with the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and myself, which was directed by the Foreign Relations Committee to study the subject and make a report. We have made a partial report. We are going to make a final report as soon as we can get the data all together.

I wanted to take this occasion only for the purpose of bringing the matter to the attention of the Senate, so that Senators could study it and form their own opinions with regard to it. I agree entirely with the Senator from Minnesota in every statement that he has made. I think there is a very great misapprehension as to the instability of the silver metal. There is no doubt that since the beginning of time there have been only 14 ounces of silver produced to every ounce of gold. It is no more of a commodity than gold, of course, because only one-fifth of the production of silver of the world is used throughout industry. The rest is used to represent money or value. But I am not going into that question now. We have been dealing with the question of exchange between governments. The Senator has already covered the question of exchange between those governments whose money has been proportionately depreciating.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. While ours has appreciated.

Mr. PITTMAN. Ours has appreciated compared to their depreciation. The difference has grown greater. We have not intention to lower the standard of our money. We do not have to do so. But it is absolutely necessary to compete with them, and if there is a chance for a substantial agreement with South America, Mexico, and the Orient to restore the standards of their money and to restore the purchasing power of their money so they can purchase from us, we should do it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it would be proper at this time to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there have been produced in all the world a little over 11,000,000,000 ounces of silver, and nearly 6,000,000,000 ounces of silver have been used in the arts and for manufactured articles. It resolves itself into the fact that there are less than 6,000,000,000 ounces of silver in the world for use as money, and most of that is held as a reserve for paper issues. That certainly is a small amount as a medium of exchange.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Utah mentioned the amount of silver used in money.

Mr. PITTMAN. No; not used as money, but in existence or supposed to be in existence.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand there is about $11,000,000,000 worth of gold in the world used as money.

Mr. KING. Available for money.

Mr. FLETCHER. And the United States and France control three-fourths, I believe the Senator said.

Mr. PITTMAN. Approximately.

Mr. SMOOT. Seventy per cent.

Mr. FLETCHER. At any rate, that is a limited supply for use as a basis for the world's money. I would like to ask the Senator if it would not be well to increase the use of silver as money in the United States without an international agreement or without disturbing the gold standard.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have no doubt that could be done by legislation, but that does not reach our exchange problem. That does not aid us to sell to the Orient or to South America or to Mexico. No matter how much silver we have here, if there is not an agreement to eliminate the causes of depression, such as dumping, the price of silver would keep on going lower and as it went lower the exchange rate would go lower. In other words, it would take more of their silver money to exchange for our gold money with which to buy our products, and it would not relieve the situation. It might relieve at certain times the circulating currency of this country, but, as I said to the Senator from Utah, the problem we have been studying is the problem of stabilizing money exchange. Our study of the situation in Japan and in China and in other countries has led us to believe that we will be isolated, and when I say "we" I mean the gold-standard countries will be isolated from the trade of the world except among themselves unless we lower our standard of value or assist them in restoring their standard of value. That is what we should do, and we should do it at once. I now yield to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] inquired a moment ago of the Senator from Nevada whether Great Britain would participate in an international conference if one were called for the consideration of the silver question. In my opinion Great Britain would be glad to participate in a conference if one were called by the United States or some important commercial nation. In May last the International Chamber of Commerce convened in this city. There were representatives in attendance from Great Britain and many other countries. Among the delegates from Great Britain were Sir Arthur Balfour, Sir Alan Anderson, and Lord Luke. There were informal discussions concerning silver and its rehabilitation among many of the delegates, and in one of these discussions the question was asked whether Great Britain would call a conference, and if not whether she would participate in such conference if one were called by some other government. My recollection is that Sir Arthur Balfour indicated that while Great Britain, at least for the present, would not call the conference, he had no doubt that if one were called the British Government would participate. In the discussion it was suggested by one or more of the participants that the Indian situation was, in part at least, responsible for the unwillingness of Great Britain to take the lead in calling a silver conference, and the view was expressed that until after the round-table conference, which was to convene in October in London, in order that the Indian question, if possible, might find a satisfactory solution, Great Britain would hesitate to call a silver conference because the result of it would undoubtedly have some reactions in India. I might add that the round-table conference met and has adjourned.

One of the delegates attending the international conference above referred to was Mr. Bomanji, a close friend of Mr. Gandhi and his representative in many conferences. He stated to Sir Arthur Balfour and to other delegates that the Indians desired the rehabilitation of silver, and that when the Indian question was solved to the satisfaction of the inhabitants of India the wrong done in destroying and debasing silver must be righted and silver given a proper monetary status. It would seem to me that Great Britain should be interested in a proper solution of what many are pleased to call the silver problem. Certainly the solution of this problem would make for peace in India and remove some of the controversial questions that continue the clouds of discontent over that country.

There are accumulating evidences to support the position taken by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD]. The latter referred to the large number of countries that have abandoned the gold standard. Statements are not infrequently heard that other countries will follow their example. Quite recently the London Statist, one of the leading financial publications of Great Britain, declared that—

> * * * It requires no very great imagination to foresee the time in the near future when an exasperated Europe will demonetize gold and throw upon the United States its gold stocks to add to the redundant gold stocks of the Federal reserve system.

Some of the leading statesmen of Great Britain are manifesting dissatisfaction with the gold standard, and not a few of them are declaring that a silver conference should be held. On the 23d of September last a largely attended meeting was held in London at which the silver question was discussed. It was urged by numerous persons that the price of silver must be raised and that it must be restored to a place in the world's monetary system. The following resolution was unanimously adopted:

> * * * That this meeting states its conviction that the raising of the price of silver and its restoration to a place in the world's monetary system offers the quickest and most effective remedy to the present disastrous fall in prices and expresses the hope that the governments principally concerned will at the earliest possible moment confer with this object in view.

A number of persons who addressed the meeting were Members of Parliament and all were from the ranks of finance, business, and politics. One of them was a former Chancellor of the Exchequer and several were prominent Members of Parliament.

I think the attitude of Premier MacDonald toward the silver question was indicated in certain questions propounded by him as stated in Mr. Wagel's book, entitled "World Economic Depression: Remedies." The questions were:

> Is finance to be based on one certain metal; is credit to be controlled by the supply, demand, and distribution of that particular metal; is the policy, theory, and practice which we accept and express in our coinage to thwart our commercial welfare?

Mr. President, Mexico has abandoned the gold standard and, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] stated, a number of other countries have pursued the same course. The prediction of the London Statist, which I have quoted, may come true. The United States and France may be charged with being hoarders of gold and misers who are forgetful of the needs of the world. It is to be hoped that these two nations may not be associated with King Midas, whose golden hoards have given him an undesirable immortality.

PLANNING FOR AGRICULTURE

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, in connection with the impressive opening remarks and statistics cited by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] on agricultural depression, though not specially related to his monetary discussion, I ask unanimous consent for the insertion in the RECORD of an article by Mr. George Soule in the New Republic of October 7, 1931, entitled "Planning for Agriculture."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> Unheralded and unreported, there occurred recently in Chicago an event more important than three-quarters of the news on the daily front pages. Its significance was both direct and indirect. Direct, because it had to do with agriculture, at once our largest and our most seriously beset occupation; indirect, because it was a conference of qualified experts to consider what should be done.
> Probably no nation in the world has more experts than the United States, and none makes less or poorer use of them. We usually rush off madly in every direction at once without any program at all; and when we get into trouble, we improvise dozens of programs, but have no good policy by which to test them.
> It is amazing to what extent the experts themselves have fallen in with this state of affairs. Economists frequently meet, but I am not aware that ever before in this country has any considerable body of them met with the intention of hammering out a policy which may conceivably be put into practice. Though their pronouncements usually have some theoretical bearing on affairs, the lack of mobilization of thought about purpose has given their lucubrations an air of unreality.
> This conference on economic policy for American agriculture, held under the auspices of the University of Chicago, was attended by less than 75 persons, nearly all of them in key positions in Government service, State agricultural colleges, or the like. Behind it was a sense of urgency provided by the knowledge of an extraordinary crisis on the farms. In order that discussion might be free, the meetings were private. In order that it might be full, each session was given over to a single subject, with a leader whose business was not to read a long paper, but to court interruptions and arguments. A conference of this sort would have to sit continuously for months, with research staffs at its elbow, to do anything like a complete job. Nevertheless, it made headway.
> The most important headway it made was in clarification of views about the function of the expert. Even on the third day there was debate concerning whether economists ought to try to formulate policy at all. Some thought that to do so would be undemocratic, an attempt to dictate. But there seemed to be a predominant feeling that there is a policy function for those who know (or should know) which can hardly be exercised by anyone else. While these persons, of course, have no power to dictate and should not aspire to dictation, if they set their collective wits to giving the wisest advice they know how to provide, they may be listened to. They have never really tried it.
> The conference came to no formal conclusions or policy; but if it had done so, they might have been somewhat as follows:
> 1. The economic problem of American agriculture is closely related to the world situation: Our staple crops are, in the main, export crops. They have suffered, not merely during the existing depression but for several years, from a deficiency of European buying power, which is closely related with (a) the tendency to seek national self-sufficiency stimulated by the danger of war, (b) tariffs and other barriers to trade, (c) reparations and war debts, (d) world-wide deflation and falling prices. There were strong opinions to the effect that we should, in the interest of the American farmer, seek immediate tariff revision downward, cancellation or radical reduction of debts and reparations, and, of course, international appeasement and disarmament. In addition, some way must be found to set the world's capital and credit to work.
> A fervid plea was made for inflation, especially for inflation by the United States, since we hold so much of the world's gold. This was supported by a number of reputable and conservative nonagricultural economists, who frankly expressed fears of a world-wide collapse of capitalism if steps of this kind were not soon taken. This position was indorsed by a prominent farm-organization leader. The proposal included not only an expansionist credit policy on the part of the Federal reserve banks and an enlarged program of public construction by borrowing, but direct aid by the Federal Government to the unemployed and the bankrupt farmers to the extent of $3,000,000,000, paid for by what would virtually be an issue of greenbacks. This latter proposal shocked a number of those present, and many of the agricultural economists were not prepared to accept it. Nevertheless, the impression was inescapable that we are on the verge of another agrarian greenback movement, with more respectable support than any such movement has ever had in our history. Imminent danger not merely to many farmers but to insurance companies, Federal land banks, and other banks exists on account of the fact that vast sums of mortgage interest can not be paid, while, if mortgages are foreclosed, there is little possibility of selling the land or using it profitably. The only solution of this problem, aside from the painful and dangerous one of immense capital liquidations, is a rise in prices.

2. Blanket restriction of production is not a policy capable of prompt or universal application. Voluntary restriction, as preached by the Farm Board, simply does not work. Even if agriculture were organized to effectuate it and even if every other industry were similarly organized, it is not sound to advise that all industries cut their output in order to obtain price advantages. Logical application of this practice all along the line would merely mean a reduced quantity of goods for everyone. The policy of the steel industry, for example, which cuts output to maintain prices, increases unemployment and offers no assistance in recovery from depression.

3. Nevertheless, it can not be asserted that American agriculture is suffering, or can suffer in the future, only from underconsumption rather than from overproduction. It is quite possible that Europe will achieve more self-sufficiency in agriculture than she now has. An advance in her standard of life above the predepression normal would not, in any case, increase her consumption of wheat, grains, or cotton; she does not import from us dairy products, vegetables, or poultry; it might help our fruit, but that increase would be inconsiderable in relation to our total crops. Our exports of meat might be affected favorably. The population of western Europe, however, will soon begin to decline.

As far as the United States is concerned, population will begin to decrease in 1960, if not before; the growth in the next 30 years will be only as great as in the past decade (17,000,000). The birth rate in rural areas is higher than in cities. There is little prospect of any increase in per capita consumption of agricultural products. Even if, as a result of rising standards of living, demand is shifted from staples to higher-cost products, there will be little need for expansion either of cultivated acreage or of manpower. The rise of output per man in agriculture will continue, since mechanization has only begun.

4. Land policy is of primary importance. There are vast areas of land which have fallen into the hands of banks and insurance companies because of foreclosure. There are other vast areas (largely cut-over lands) which are subject to seizure by States, counties, or townships because of tax delinquency. More land every day is delinquent either in interest or taxes; and in many cases the creditors are reluctant to assume the burden of responsibility for it. We ought to know how much land we want in cultivation, how much in forests, and what land. Serious governmental problems are involved, because of the necessity of maintaining schools, roads, and other services for sparse and poor communities, on land most of which is deserted. All this creates a need for land-utilization surveys and State and regional planning, which must consider the joint needs of agriculture, industry, recreation, water supply, forestation and rainfall, power, transportation, etc.

5. The effects of mechanization must be foreseen and dealt with: Mechanization tends to enlarge the size of farms, increase the requirements of technical skill, create unsalable surpluses, enhance the importance of capital as against land and labor, broaden the areas and change the nature of competition, and increase the dependence of farmers on the whole commercial structure. It does not, in general, mean the dominance of corporate farming in gigantic units; the margin is not large enough to attract speculative capital or pay costly overhead. There will doubtless be some increase of corporate farming under specially favorable conditions, but the bulk of production will come from "the capitalistic family farm."

In addition we shall have a large number of family-subsistence farms, now tending to increase as a refuge from unemployment, and always desired by many, even though unprofitable commercially, because of the attraction of farming as a way of life. Under modern conditions, however, nearly every farm family must have some cash income. Perhaps a solution of this part of the problem would be to encourage industry in rural communities, so that people could work part time in factories and part time on the land.

All through the conference members had been wondering how any desirable policy could be effectuated. What agencies could be counted upon to do the job? There are millions of farmers, numerous other related interests, no dictatorship, and no possibility of one. At this point a detailed suggestion was made which fitted so closely the sort of policy which seemed to be required, the linking of the necessary agencies to implement it, and the desirable collaboration between the experts and the practical men that after discussion it met with unanimous approval.

The proposal required dividing the country into a number of main agricultural regions, each more or less naturally defined by types of soil, climate, and nature of agriculture. For each region a regional planning council would be formed of men familiar with the situation in the region. They would cooperate with the public or semipublic agencies concerned, and have as experts men detailed from the State colleges or other research institutions. Each council would immediately study the situation and the outlook for various crops. It would consider readjustment in production, and make recommendations for next season's farming plans as far as possible by the 1st of January, 1932. It would consider emergency phases of taxation, credit, marketing, etc., and give advice, whether for local, State, or National action. It would also consider the effects on its region of national or international policies, such as those concerned with tariffs, finance, or price stabilization.

There would be a national agricultural planning council, to be appointed from the Farm Board, the Department of Agriculture, and other interested Federal agencies. It would designate the regions, inaugurate the regional councils, suggest problems to be considered by them, and appraise their recommendations from a national standpoint. It would consider national agricultural policy and make recommendations for legislation.

State conferences, containing representatives of State governments, farmers' organizations, financial institutions, etc., would meet in January to consider the conclusions presented by the councils, and ways of effecting them if approved.

Having done its best to meet the emergency, this planning machinery would turn its attention to long-range measures. These are described by Dr. M. J. Tolley, the author of the plan, as follows:

"Research would be directed toward determining the comparative advantage and competitive strength of the different regions in the production of different commodities. This might take the form of developing the agricultural plans (stated in "farm-organization" terms) for each region that will give the best returns under different price conditions, taking into account the production possibilities (relation between physical inputs and outputs) of the region, the characteristics of the farmers, etc. Continuing research would be necessary in order to learn the effects of improvements in technique, change in prices, etc., on any plans that may have been formulated for a region. Economic experimentation would have a place in the research program.

"One of the first duties of the regional councils would be to arrange with Federal and State agencies for zoning the land in each region into agricultural areas, nonagricultural areas, areas that may be suitable for agriculture at a later date, etc. A vast amount of research would be necessary before the zoning could be done accurately and in detail, but the councils would obtain an approximate zoning on the basis of knowledge now available. The zoning could be revised and refined as conditions change and additional information becomes available.

"The agricultural land in each region would be zoned as soon as possible into type-of-farming areas (areas with homogeneous soil and climatic conditions, where similar types of farming prevail). The research activities of the councils and affiliated State and national agencies could then be directed toward developing the best farming plans for each type-of-farming area and revisions in plans made necessary or desirable by changing conditions.

"The State boards would give attention to some problems not entirely agricultural—e. g., plans for consolidating local governmental units; for highway development; for use of water in arid regions for agricultural, domestic, and other purposes; etc.

"The national and regional planning councils to devote a good part of their energies to informing the public concerning the objectives of their work, their conclusions and recommendations and the reasons therefor; the councils to be free to give publicity to their findings without regard to the possible effect on the political fortunes of parties or factions."

The conference ended by taking steps to bring this plan to the attention of those who might help to inaugurate it.

This, of course, is only the beginning of a beginning. But it shows which way the wind blows. Its potentialities run far beyond anything that can briefly be said about it. Really to serve agriculture, as to serve any other element in the national economic life, we must get down to the job of collective engineering. It will be a long, unspectacular, and, at the beginning, clumsily handled endeavor. But there is no other way.

GEORGE SOULE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The clerk will read the message from the President of the United States.

The Chief Clerk read the message, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In my message of the 8th instant I stated that I should address the Congress at greater length upon our foreign affairs.

WORLD WAR DEBT POSTPONEMENT

With the support of a large majority of the individual Members of the Senate and House, I informed the governments concerned last June that—

The American Government proposes the postponement during one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparations, and relief debts, both principal and interest, of course not including obligations of governments held by private parties. Subject to confirmation by Congress, the American Government will postpone all payments upon the debts of foreign governments to the American Government payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1 next, conditional on a like postponement for one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts owing the important creditor powers.

In making this proposal, I also publicly stated:

The purpose of this action is to give the forthcoming year to the economic recovery of the world and to help free the recuperative forces already in motion in the United States from retarding influences from abroad.

The world-wide depression has affected the countries of Europe more severely than our own. Some of these countries are feeling to a serious extent the drain of this depression on national economy. The fabric of intergovernmental debts, supportable in normal times, weighs heavily in the midst of this depression.

From a variety of causes arising out of the depression, such as the fall in the price of foreign commodities and the lack of confidence in economic and political stability abroad, there is an abnormal movement of gold into the United States which is lowering the credit stability of many foreign countries. These and the other difficulties abroad diminish buying power for our exports and in a measure are the cause of our continued unemployment and continued lower prices to our farmers.

Wise and timely action should contribute to relieve the pressure of these adverse forces in foreign countries and should assist in the reestablishment of confidence, thus forwarding political peace and economic stability in the world.

Authority of the President to deal with this problem is limited, as this action must be supported by the Congress. It has been assured the cordial support of leading members of both parties in the Senate and the House. The essence of this proposition is to give time to permit debtor governments to recover their national prosperity. I am suggesting to the American people that they be wise creditors in their own interest and be good neighbors.

I wish to take this occasion also to frankly state my views upon our relations to German reparations and the debts owed to us by the allied governments of Europe. Our Government has not been a party to, or exerted any voice in determination of, reparation obligations. We purposely did not participate in either general reparations or the division of colonies or property. The repayment of debts due to us from the Allies for the advance for war and reconstruction were settled upon a basis not contingent upon German reparations or related thereto. Therefore, reparations is necessarily wholly a European problem with which we have no relation.

I do not approve in any remote sense of the cancellation of the debts to us. World confidence would not be enhanced by such action. None of our debtor nations have ever suggested it. But as the basis of the settlement of these debts was the capacity under normal conditions of the debtor to pay, we should be consistent with our own policies and principles if we take into account the abnormal situation now existing in the world. I am sure the American people have no desire to attempt to extract any sum beyond the capacity of any debtor to pay, and it is our view that broad vision requires that our Government should recognize the situation as it exists.

This course of action is entirely consistent with the policy which we have hitherto pursued. We are not involved in the discussion of strictly European problems, of which the payment of German reparations is one. It represents our willingness to make a contribution to the early restoration of world prosperity in which our own people have so deep an interest.

I wish further to add that while this action has no bearing on the conference for limitation of land armaments to be held next February, inasmuch as the burden of competitive armaments has contributed to bring about this depression, we trust that by this evidence of our desire to assist we shall have contributed to the good will which is so necessary in the solution of this major question.

All the important creditor governments accepted this proposal. The necessary agreements among them have been executed, and creditor governments have foregone the receipt of payments due them since July 1, 1931.

The effect of this agreement was instantaneous in reversing the drift toward general economic panic and has served to give time to the peoples of those countries to readjust their economic life. The action taken was necessary. I am confident it commends itself to the judgment of the American people.

Payments due to the United States Government from many countries, both on account of principal and interest, fall due on December 15. It is highly desirable that a law should be enacted before that date authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to postpone all payments due us on account of debts owed by foreign governments to the United States Government during the year ending June 30, 1932, and to provide for their payment over a 10-year period, beginning July 1, 1933.

As we approach the new year it is clear that a number of the governments indebted to us will be unable to meet further payments to us in full pending recovery in their economic life. It is useless to blind ourselves to an obvious fact. Therefore it will be necessary in some cases to make still further temporary adjustments.

The Congress has shared with the Executive in the past the consideration of questions arising from these debts. I am sure that it will commend itself to the Congress, that the legislative branch of the Government should continue to share this responsibility. In order that we should be in position to deal with the situation, I recommend the recreation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission, with authority to examine such problems as may arise in connection with these debts during the present economic emergency, and to report to the Congress its conclusions and recommendations.

DISARMAMENT

The United States has accepted an invitation to take part in the World Disarmament Conference which convenes on February 2 at Geneva. The efforts of this conference will be in line with the endeavors in which the American Government has taken a leading part beginning with The Hague Conference in 1899. Up to the present time the record of achievement has been almost entirely in the field of naval disarmament. It is to be hoped that further progress can be made in reduction of naval arms and that limitation and reduction so urgently needed can be extended to land arms.

The burden of taxes to support armament is greater today than before the Great War, and the economic instability of the world is definitely due in part to this cause and the fears which these huge armaments at all times create. No discouragements should be permitted to turn the world from sane and reasonable limitation of arms.

With a view to establishing an atmosphere of confidence for the opening of this World Disarmament Conference more than 40 governments, including all the principal military and naval powers, have joined in accepting the principle of a 1-year armaments truce. This truce, which is the outgrowth of a proposal advanced last September by the Foreign Minister of Italy, is designed to prevent the expansion-of-armaments program during the coming months in the hope of removing the threat of a sudden revival of competition in arms before and during the conference. These steps were fully approved by our War and Navy Departments.

MANCHURIA

We have been deeply concerned over the situation in Manchuria. As parties to the Kellogg-Briand pact and to the nine-power treaty, we have a responsibility in maintaining the integrity of China and a direct interest with other nations in maintaining peace here.

When this controversy originated in September the League of Nations was in session and China appealed to the council of that body, which at once undertook measures of conciliation between China and Japan. Both China and Japan have participated in these proceedings before the council ever since. Under the Kellogg-Briand pact all of the signatories, including China and Japan, have covenanted to seek none but pacific means in the settlement of their disputes. Thus the ultimate purpose of proceedings under this section of the Kellogg-Briand pact and of conciliation proceedings by the league covenant coincide. It seemed, therefore, both wise and appropriate rather to aid and advise with the league and thus have unity of world effort to maintain peace than to take independent action. In all negotiations, however, the Department of State has maintained complete freedom of judgment and action as to participation in any measures which the league might finally determine upon.

Immediately after the outbreak of the trouble this Government advised both Japan and China of its serious interest. Subsequently it communicated its views to both Governments regarding their obligations under the Kellogg-Briand pact. In this action we were joined by other nations signatory of the pact. This Government has consistently and repeatedly by diplomatic representations indicated its unremitting solicitude that these treaty obligations be respected. In the recurring efforts of the nations to bring about a peaceful settlement this Government has realized that the exercise of the utmost patience was desirable, and it is believed that public opinion in this country has appreciated the wisdom of this restraint.

At present a resolution is pending before the meeting at Paris, with hopes of passage, under which Japan and China will agree to take no initiative which might lead to renewed conflict; in which Japan has reiterated its intention to withdraw the Japanese troops to the railway zone as soon as lives and property of Japanese nationals in Manchuria can be adequately protected; and under which both nations agree to a neutral commission to meet on the ground, to which commission all matters in dispute can be referred for investigation and report.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Conversations were begun between the Secretary of State and the Canadian minister at Washington on November 14 looking to the framing of a treaty for the development of the St. Lawrence seaway. The negotiations are continuing. I am hopeful that an agreement may result within a reasonable time enabling us to begin work on this great project, which will be of much importance economically to Canada and to the United States.

VISITS OF M. LAVAL AND SIGNOR GRANDI

The president of the Council of Ministers of France, M. Laval, visited Washington in October in order to discuss problems of outstanding world interest, in the solution of which it was felt that the two countries could be of assistance. The informal and cordial conversations served to bring into relief the respective positions of the two nations.

The visit in November of the Royal Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs also afforded an opportunity for a cordial exchange of views respecting the many world problems in which this Government and the Government of Italy are interested.

It was not the purpose of these meetings to engage in any commitments or to conclude agreements. However, the visits of M. Laval and Signor Grandi, together with the various meetings of statesmen in Europe and the visit of the Secretary of State to European countries, have brought about valuable understanding of the nature of the problems confronting different governments which should aid in their solution.

NICARAGUA

In compliance with the agreement made in May, 1927, the Nicaraguan Government requested supervision by an electoral commission from the United States of the congressional elections held in 1930. This year a member of the commissions of 1928 and 1930 was sent to Nicaragua as an observer during the election of municipal authorities in order that, on the basis of his observations, it might be possible to arrange the many necessary details of the supervision of the 1932 presidential election in Nicaragua.

Armed forces of the United States maintained in Nicaragua have been reduced to the minimum deemed necessary to the training of the Nicaraguan Constabulary and the rendering of appropriate support for such instruction. It is proposed to withdraw completely American armed forces from Nicaragua after their presidential election in 1932.

Nicaragua suffered a terrible disaster in the destruction of Managua, the capital, by earthquake and fire in March last. With their usual generosity the American people, through the Red Cross, went whole-heartedly to the assistance of the stricken country. United States marines and Engineers of the War Department, who were in the country making a survey of the proposed canal route, joined in rendering service. The American legation building was destroyed with all its contents, but the minister and his staff continued to carry on their official duties and worked ceaselessly in the face of unusual hardships. The Nicaraguan Government has expressed its deep gratitude for the aid rendered.

HAITI

Substantial progress has been made in carrying out the program for the withdrawal of our activities in Haiti recommended by the commission which, with the support of the Congress, made an investigation of Haitian affairs in 1930, and by its good offices laid the foundation for the present popularly elected Government of that Republic.

After protracted negotiations an accord was reached with the Haitian Government on August 5 providing for the return to Haitian control of important Government services heretofore carried on under American supervision by virtue of general obligations arising through the provisions of our treaty with Haiti. In accordance with this agreement the Haitian Government on October 1 assumed definitely the administration and control of the department of public works, the sanitary service, and the technical service of agriculture, which includes the industrial educational system. All American personnel was withdrawn from these services. To minimize the possibility of epidemics, and in order that the health of the American troops and officials still stationed in Haiti might be adequately protected, the accord provided that an American scientific mission, consisting of three American naval officers and six Hospital Corps men, should be charged with the control of sanitation in the cities of Port au Prince and Cape Haitien.

The accord makes appropriate provision for the continuance of adequate financial control and assistance on the part of our Government. The liberty of action, both of the Government of the United States and the Government of Haiti with respect to questions of financial administration, is, of course, limited. In this connection it must be borne in mind that investors have supplied capital desired by Haiti and that securities have been issued to them on the faith and credit of the provisions of that treaty and the American financial control which it provided during the life of the bonds.

BOLIVIA AND PARAGUAY

In 1929 the Government of the United States, together with the Governments of Cuba, Colombia, Mexico, and Uruguay, formed the Commission on Inquiry and Conciliation, Bolivia-Paraguay, which had the good fortune of being able to terminate an international incident which for a time threatened to cause war between the countries involved. The five neutral governments then offered their good offices to Bolivia and Paraguay, with a view to furthering a settlement of their difficulties. This offer was accepted in principle. I am happy to state that representatives of both countries are now meeting in Washington with the hope of concluding a pact of nonaggression between them.

ARBITRATION OF THE BOUNDARY DISPUTE BETWEEN GUATEMALA AND HONDURAS

It has been the privilege of this Government to lend its good offices on several occasions in the past to the settlement of boundary disputes between the American republics. One of the most recent occasions upon which the disinterested services of this Government were requested was in connection with the settlement of the dispute which for almost a century has been outstanding between the Republics of Guatemala and Honduras with respect to their common boundary. Conferences extending over a period of some months were held in 1930 in the Department of State, and eventually on July 16, 1930, a treaty was signed submitting the question to arbitration, and there was also signed a supplementary convention providing for the delimitation of the boundary after the arbitral tribunal hands down its award. Ratifications were exchanged on October 15, 1931. The tribunal, which will meet in Washington, will be presided over by the Chief Justice of the United States, who has set December 15, 1931, as the date for the first meeting.

MEXICO

The period for hearings before the general and special claims commissions between this country and Mexico expired in August, 1931. Pursuant to a resolution of the Senate under date of February 28, 1931, and under instructions from the Department of State, the American ambassador at Mexico City is carrying on negotiations with the Mexican Government looking to the renewal of the activities of the commissions, in order that the claims of American citizens still pending may be heard and adjudicated.

The Governments of the United States and Mexico have approved in principle certain engineering plans submitted by the International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico, for the rectification of the Rio Grande in the vicinity of El Paso, Tex., to prevent periodical floods in that region. Negotiations are being carried on between the two Governments in an effort to reach an agreement by which this important international project may be undertaken.

TREATIES AND CONVENTIONS BEFORE THE SENATE

There have been transmitted to the Senate, from time to time, treaties and conventions which have failed during recent sessions to obtain that body's consideration or final decision. Inasmuch as these treaties affect numerous phases of private and public endeavor, I earnestly commend their early conclusion to the attention of the Congress.

In the past session of the Congress I transmitted to the Senate protocols providing for adherence by the United States to the Permanent Court of International Justice. Upon that occasion I expressed my views fully not only of the wisdom of such action, but that the safeguards against European entanglements stipulated for by the Senate had been in effect secured and the interests of the United States protected. I need not repeat that for over 12 years every President and every Secretary of State has urged this action as a material contribution to the pacific settlement of controversies among nations and a further assurance against war.

By consideration of legislation during its last session, the Congress informed itself thoroughly regarding the merits of the copyright convention signed at Berlin on November 13, 1908. I hope that necessary legislation will be enacted during this Congress which will make it possible for further consideration to be given to the copyright convention.

The sockeye salmon fisheries treaty, entered into with Canada to afford protection to the industry, which was signed on May 26, 1930, merits the attention of the Senate during the present session.

The United States sent a delegation to the conference on safety of life at sea, which was held in London in 1929. The convention, which was signed by the more important maritime nations of the world on May 31, 1929, has unified the standards of safety in accordance with modern developments of engineering science and in compliance with the governments' obligation to their citizens to reduce the perils of travel to a minimum by requiring high efficiency in seamanship.

The convention for the supervision of the international trade in arms and ammunition and in implements of war, signed at Geneva, June 17, 1925, represents another of the steps taken in the general field of restriction of armament. It has been ratified unconditionally by some nations, conditionally by others. With the added impetus which ratification by the United States would lend to such a move, it is quite possible that the 14 ratifications necessary by treaty stipulation would be received to bring the convention into force.

Among the other treaties and conventions which remain before the Senate for its consideration and of no less importance in their respective fields are a treaty regarding consular agents of American States (Sixth International Conference of American States, Habana, 1928); a treaty relating to maritime neutrality with American States (Sixth International Conference of American States, Habana, 1928); the general treaty of inter-American arbitration, signed at Washington January 5, 1929; the convention relating to prisoners of war, signed at Geneva on July 27, 1929; a convention signed on the same date for the amelioration of the condition of wounded and sick of armies in the field (the Red Cross convention); and the convention for the unification of certain rules relating to bills of lading for the carriage of goods by sea, signed at Brussels on behalf of the United States on June 23, 1925.

NEW TREATIES AND CONVENTIONS

Since my message to the Seventy-second Congress, and by virtue of the power vested in the office of the Chief Executive, I have continued to commission representatives of this Government to negotiate treaties with the representatives of other countries which affect the amicable, political, commercial, and juridical relations of this country, as well as treaties dealing with humanitarian matters.

Important treaties and conventions which have been signed recently by representatives of this Government are as follows:

1. Treaty of arbitration and conciliation with Switzerland, signed February 16, 1931.
2. Treaty modifying the conciliation convention with Italy (Bryan peace treaty), signed September 23, 1931.
3. Extradition treaty with Greece, signed May 6, 1931.
4. Protocol relating to military obligations in certain cases of double nationality, multilateral, signed December 31, 1930.
5. Treaty of friendship, commerce, and consular rights with Poland, signed June 15, 1931.
6. Treaty with reference to establishment and sojourn with Turkey, signed October 28, 1931.

These treaties and conventions will be transmitted to the Senate in due course, with a view to obtaining its advice and consent to ratification.

PROPOSED BOULDER CANYON LEGISLATION

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, during my visit to Las Vegas and Boulder Dam in October I made an investigation of conditions and found that a need exists for amendments to the Boulder Canyon project act in order fully to provide for the construction and maintenance of adequate school and recreational facilities on the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation; for the purpose of establishing definitely the right of qualified residents on the reservation to vote; to empower the State and county to assess private property for purposes of taxation; and to extend the State safety and industrial insurance laws within the bounds of the reservation.

In this connection I wrote a letter to the Hon. Ray Lyman Wilbur, Secretary of the Interior, on October 26, 1931, and to the Hon. Fred B. Balzar, Governor of the State of Nevada, on November 19, 1931, and have received their hearty cooperation in the matter. This brief correspondence I submit for inclusion in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OCTOBER 26, 1931.

Hon. RAY LYMAN WILBUR,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: After investigating conditions relating to the Hoover Dam enterprise, I find that the relations between the Government and the people and industries in this section of the State can be materially improved by amendments to the law under which these operations are being conducted, in order that certain errors and omissions in the law can be corrected and the department relieved of the difficulty of interpreting some of its uncertain portions.

I am in accord with your policy regarding the establishment of a Federal reservation under your control in order that the work may be conducted in an efficient and orderly manner, with the necessary protection to the operations and to those conducting them.

I find considerable uncertainty existing regarding the question of exemption or nonexemption of personal property and industry within the reservation, including Boulder City, from State and county taxation. The exemption of this property from such taxation will deprive the State and county of moneys to which they are entitled. It will create a condition under which business and industry within the reservation will be subsidized by the Government, and because of the advantages gained thereby they will be brought in unfair competition with those conducted in Las Vegas and other places outside the reservation where property is subjected to taxation. It will also throw an extra burden on the Las Vegas schools, which are educating numbers of the children from the reservation, without receiving any compensation therefor. The Comptroller General has ruled that no part of the Hoover Dam funds can be used for educational and recreational purposes. In an enterprise of the importance and size of this one adequate educational and recreational facilities should be provided. They should be a necessary part of the enterprise itself.

The city of Las Vegas is entitled to special consideration in connection with the Hoover Dam enterprise. Its citizens have worked hard for many years in assisting in the creation of this enterprise and in carrying it to a successful conclusion. They are carrying a heavy burden financially in caring for the large number of unemployed without means, who have come to the city looking for work on the Hoover Dam enterprise.

Some provision should be made similar to that existing in some of the national parks, by which a commissioner is appointed to serve within the reservation with power to bind over to the district court and also to impose sentence in cases of minor infractions of law.

Another unfortunate condition existing is the uncertainty of the residents within the reservation as to their right to vote. To deprive them of this right will be un-American and wrong, and especially as a large number of American citizens are employed on this project, over 40 per cent of whom are ex-service men. Proper steps should be taken that will guarantee to all citizens residing within the reservation their right to vote.

I propose to introduce legislation which will correct these errors and omissions in the law and others that may exist, and will be glad to have your cooperation in their preparation.

I desire to commend the fine efficiency of the officials of your department who are so successfully conducting this vast enterprise.

With my best wishes, I remain, very sincerely yours,

TASKER L. ODDIE.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, November 2, 1931.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE:
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR ODDIE: It is gratifying to have your letter of October 26 relating to legislation affecting the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation. I shall be very happy to confer with you on this subject and to cooperate with you in the consideration and preparation of legislation found to be necessary to meet conditions there.

For your information there are herewith inclosed copies of two decisions by the Comptroller General relating to school facilities. From the supplemental opinion you will note the Comptroller General's ruling to the effect that Government funds may be used for the construction of a school building, but not for the purpose of transporting pupils or for the payment of teachers.

Very truly yours,

RAY LYMAN WILBUR.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, September 29, 1931.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: Consideration has been given to your letter of August 28, 1931, as follows:

"In connection with the construction of Hoover Dam and appurtenant works, as authorized by the Boulder Canyon project act of December 21, 1928 (45 Stat. 1057), section 14 of which makes applicable the reclamation laws, except as otherwise therein provided, it is necessary, because of the isolated territory involved and the complete absence of housing facilities, to erect various buildings for administration and other purposes. In addition to the buildings referred to, which include an administration building, dormitory, garage, and approximately 60 cottages for Government employees, it is also necessary to provide educational facilities. This would involve erection of the required buildings and employment of teachers. To prevent inordinate turnover in labor, make for contentment, and thus to facilitate the work, it is essential that the men employed bring their families and that school facilities be made available for the children.

"With the establishment of the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation in Clark County, Nev., effective May 26, 1931 (copy of the Secretary's letter of May 19, 1931, to the Governor of Nevada is inclosed with copy of the plat showing the boundaries of the reservation), exclusive jurisdiction over the territory involved was vested in the United States. There being no authority in the State of Nevada to conduct schools within this territory, it is proposed to erect at Government expense a school building at an estimated cost of $57,000. The building will contain 12 classrooms for children below the high-school age, and a like building of substantially the same size and cost will probably be erected later for use as a high school.

"As an alternative to the erection of a high-school building at Boulder City, or at least as a temporary expedient, it has been proposed that the Government bear the expense of transporting high-school students by bus from Boulder City to Las Vegas, a distance of approximately 30 miles, and pay from Government funds the tuition of students so handled. Copy of letter dated July 7, 1931, by the special attorney to the Secretary outlining in detail the plan of transporting the students to and from Las Vegas is inclosed. Also inclosed is copy of that portion of the letter from the special attorney to the Secretary of July 18, 1931, which treats of the question of the authority of the Secretary of the Interior to provide school facilities at Boulder City under existing laws. However, regardless of which plan is followed, it is proposed to make a reasonable and direct charge against all who attend the schools, whether graded or high school, for the purpose, so far as it is practicable to do so, of recovering the cost of providing education facilities. This charge would be in lieu of taxes which, except for the existence of the Federal reservation, would be assessed for school purposes.

"It is also proposed to construct a public swimming pool within Boulder City, including necessary dressing rooms and a wading pool and sand lots for small children, at an estimated cost of $35,000. It is believed that the revenues which will be collected from bathers will be sufficient to repay the cost of the plant with interest on advances, as well as cover the cost of operation and maintenance. On account of the intense heat at the site of this work during the larger portion of the year and the very limited facilities for bathing, it is essential to the health and comfort of the men employed that there be made available bathing facilities, and the most practical and economical method of handling this situation is by means of a public swimming pool.

"As stated in the first paragraph of this letter, section 14 of the Boulder Canyon project act of December 21, 1928, makes applicable the reclamation laws, except as otherwise provided therein, and section 10 of the organic reclamation act of June 17, 1902, (32 Stat. 390), is as follows: 'That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect.' It is the view of this department that the erection of a graded school and a high school, or the adoption of the alternative high-school plan, and also the construction of a swimming pool are necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Boulder Canyon project act. Your advance opinion on these questions is respectfully requested."

Section 2 (a) of the Boulder Canyon project act of December 21, 1928, supra, provides as follows:

"There is hereby established a special fund, to be known as the 'Colorado River Dam fund' (hereinafter referred to as the 'fund'), and to be available, as hereafter provided, only for carrying out the provisions of this act. All revenues received in carrying out the provisions of this act shall be paid into and expenditures shall be made out of the fund, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior."

An initial appropriation of $10,660,000 for this fund was made by the act of July 3, 1930 (46 Stat. 877), in the following terms:

"Boulder Canyon project: For the commencement of construction of a dam and incidental works in the main stream of the Colorado River at Black Canyon, to create a storage reservoir, and of a complete plant and incidental structures suitable for the fullest economic development of electrical energy from the water discharged from such reservoir; to acquire by proceedings in eminent domain, or otherwise, all lands, rights of way, and other property necessary for such purposes; and for incidental operations; as authorized by the Boulder Canyon project act approved December 21, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. III, title 33, ch. 15A), $10,660,000, to remain available until advanced to the Colorado River Dam fund, which amount shall be available for personal services in the District of Columbia and for all other objects of expenditure that are specified for projects included under the caption 'Bureau of Reclamation' in the Interior Department appropriation acts for the fiscal years 1930 and 1931, without regard to the limitations of amounts therein set forth: Provided, That of the amount hereby appropriated, not to exceed $100,000 shall be available for investigation and reports as authorized by section 15 of the Boulder Canyon project act."

An additional appropriation of $15,000,000 in substantially the same terms was made by the appropriation act of February 14, 1931 (46 Stat. 1146). For the "objects of expenditure that are specified for projects included under the caption 'Bureau of Reclamation' in the Interior Department appropriation acts for the fiscal years 1930 and 1931," reference is made to the acts of March 4, 1929 (45 Stat. 1589), and May 14, 1930 (46 Stat. 305). The additional appropriation of $15,000,000 appearing in the annual appropriation act for 1932, supra, is made available for items appearing under the heading "Bureau of Reclamation" in the same statute (46 Stat. 1142).

The purposes of the Boulder Canyon project act of December 21, 1928, supra, for which the "Colorado River Dam fund" is available are set forth in section 1 of the act as follows:

"That for the purpose of controlling the floods, improving navigation, and regulating the flow of the Colorado River, providing for storage and for the delivery of the stored waters thereof for reclamation of public lands and other beneficial uses exclusively within the United States, and for the generation of electrical energy as a means of making the project herein authorized a self-supporting and financially solvent undertaking, the Secretary of the Interior, subject to the terms of the Colorado River compact hereinafter mentioned, is hereby authorized to construct, operate, and maintain a dam and incidental works in the main stream of the Colorado River at Black Canyon or Boulder Canyon adequate to create a storage reservoir of a capacity of not less than 20,000,000 acre-feet of water and a main canal and appurtenant structures located entirely within the United States connecting the Laguna Dam, or other suitable diversion dam, which the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to construct if deemed necessary or advisable by him upon engineering or economic considerations, with the Imperial and Coachella Valleys in California, the expenditures for said main canal and appurtenant structures to be reimbursable, as provided in the reclamation law, and shall not be paid out of revenues derived from the sale or disposal of water power or electric energy at the dam authorized to be constructed at said Black Canyon or Boulder Canyon, or for water for potable purposes outside of the Imperial and Coachella Valleys: Provided, however, That no charge shall be made for water or for the use, storage, or delivery of water for irrigation or water for potable purposes in the Imperial or Coachella Valleys; also to construct and equip, operate, and maintain at or near said dam, or cause to be constructed, a complete plant and incidental structures suitable for the fullest economic development of electrical energy from the water discharged from said reservoir; and to acquire by proceedings in eminent domain, or otherwise, all lands, rights of way, and other property necessary for said purposes."

In none of the cited statutes creating the Colorado River Dam fund, appropriating therefor, and stating the purposes for which the fund would be available, is there any provision specifically, or by reasonable implication, making the fund available for construction of school buildings, transportation of pupils, or construction of a swimming pool. The general authority vested in the Secretary of the Interior by section 14 of the Boulder Canyon project act and section 10 of the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, referred to in your letter, is not sufficient to render the fund available for any item of expenditure the Secretary of the Interior may approve, regardless of its connection with the purposes for which the fund was created and appropriated. There must be a direct relationship between the purposes for which the expenditure is proposed and the purposes for which the fund was created and appropriated. Any other proposed expenditure, even though deemed proper by the Secretary of the Interior as indirectly connected with the project for which the fund was provided, must first have the sanction of the Congress. It does not appear from the legislation involved that the Congress intended to vest in the Secretary of the Interior such unlimited powers in connection with the expenditure of this fund. Educational facilities and swimming pools in close proximity to the residences of employees engaged on the project, while probably desirable for convenience and comfort of Government and contractors' employees, the connection between expenditures for such purposes and the purposes set forth in the controlling statutes would seem to be too remote to justify the use of the fund in question without the prior approval of the Congress. That the Department of the Interior and the Congress heretofore have considered that specific legislation on the subject would be required is evident from the legislative history of S. 5797 and H. R. 16422, both entitled "Authorizing establishment of Boulder City town site, and necessary expenditures in connection therewith, and for other purposes," which were introduced in the Congress during its last session, but failed of enactment.

The Senate bill passed the Senate February 10, 1931. The committee reports and the debates in the Senate clearly disclose that the legislation was deemed essential. But neither of the bills became law. The operation of schools and swimming pools for the benefit of Government and contractors' employees on a cost basis, as proposed, would appear to be an attempt to accomplish that which the Congress has failed to authorize. The following statement made by the special attorney, forwarded with your submission, is advanced as a reason for failure of the proposed legislation to be enacted:

"* * * A prominent and influential member of the Rules Committee, Mr. MICHENER, stated to me toward the close of the session that it was not thought that the legislation was necessary—that the department could do without it what it needed to do."

There is nothing of record as to the reason for the failure of the bills, and, in any event, there is nothing to indicate that the Congress would have sanctioned the use of the fund in question for the construction and operation of educational facilities and swimming pools.

While there is generally recognized to be an obligation on the United States to provide for the education of children necessarily residing within Government reservations, as contended in this case, schools on Government reservations are maintained only under specific statutory authority therefor. There may be cited as illustrative appropriations for education of Indians and for operation of schools on naval reservations. For the former see the act of February 14, 1931 (46 Stat. 1129), and for the latter see the act of February 28, 1931 (46 Stat. 1438).

You are advised, therefore, that under existing laws the fund "Colorado River Dam fund" is not available for construction of school buildings, transportation of pupils, or the construction of a swimming pool.

Respectfully.

J. R. MCCARL,
Comptroller General of the United States.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, October 17, 1931.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: There has been received your letter of October 7, 1931, requesting reconsideration of decision of September 29, 1931, holding that the appropriation fund entitled "Colorado River Dam Fund," providing for the construction of the Hoover Dam, under the terms of the act of December 21, 1928 (45 Stat. 1057), is not available for the construction of schools and swimming pools for use of Government and contractors' employees residing on the Government reservation. It is understood the request for reconsideration is limited to the question whether the appropriation may be used for construction of buildings in which schools may be conducted at the expense of interests other than the Government, pending approval by the Congress of the establishment of a permanent school system.

There is again stressed the difficulty in attracting to the project the proper personnel without adequate school facilities, and there is cited a decision of a former Comptroller of the Treasury, dated September 24, 1917, holding the reclamation fund available for construction of temporary buildings in which to conduct schools during the construction of, and at the site of, a reclamation project.

In view of the further representations now made to the effect that the construction of the Hoover Dam is being delayed by lack of school facilities, and that, in your opinion, "the erection of school buildings is necessary to carry out the purposes of the project act," you are advised that this office will interpose no objection to the use of the appropriation in question for the construction of temporary buildings in which schools may be conducted during the current school year, provided the contractor will bear the expense of maintaining and operating the schools unless and until otherwise specifically provided for by law.

Respectfully,

J. R. MCCARL,
Comptroller General of the United States.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 19, 1931.

Hon. FRED B. BALZAR,
Executive Chambers, Carson City, Nev.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: During my recent tour of the State I devoted considerable time to the study of conditions surrounding the Hoover Dam enterprise, and, upon the completion of this investigation, I addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Ray Lyman Wilbur, on October 26, calling attention to the need for clarifying amendments to the Boulder Dam act.

The enactment of the amendments indicated will pave the way for a closer cooperation between the State and Government in the work at the dam.

Inclosed is copy of my letter of October 26 to the Secretary of the Interior, together with copy of his reply thereto under date of November 2.

In order fully to protect the interests of the State of Nevada, it is my view that the Boulder Dam Act should be so amended that the Government would be obliged to provide for the construction and maintenance of adequate school and recreational facilities on the reservation; to establish definitely the right of qualified residents on the reservation to vote; and the right of the State and county to assess private property for purposes of taxation.

I am soon to take this matter up with the Secretary with the view to formulating the necessary amendments to the Boulder Dam Act and before doing so I shall greatly appreciate learning your views upon the subject and having any suggestions which you desire to make by which the interests of the State of Nevada can be fully protected and improved. I shall therefore request you to send me reply at your very earliest convenience by air mail.

With best wishes, I remain,
Very sincerely yours,

TASKER L. ODDIE.

STATE OF NEVADA,
EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Carson City, November 24, 1931.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your air mail letter of the 19th instant, which evidently reached here by RMS, and I hasten to reply thereto.

I appreciate your thoughts in the matter, and fully concur in all the suggestions contained in paragraph 4 of that letter.

In addition, may I suggest the desirability, if amendments to the Boulder Canyon project act are proposed, to add provision allowing the State to enforce its safety and industrial insurance laws within the bounds of Federal reservations.

I do not know whether you are advised that the six companies have caused an injunction to be served on State Mine Inspector Stinson restraining him from enforcing mine inspection laws, and the matter is to be heard in the United States District Court on December 12.

To-day's press reports bring news that County Assessor DeVinney, of Clark County, has been served with a like injunction, issued out of the Federal court, prohibiting him from attempting to assess privately owned property or from attempting to collect poll taxes within the bounds of the reservation, but at the moment of writing I am not advised what date has been set in this particular matter.

It is quite patent that congressional action should be had in the matter at the earliest possible moment, because under the terms of the restraining order no enforcement of the State labor laws is possible, nor any inspecition of conditions looking to the safeguarding of lives.

You are no doubt aware that more than a dozen fatalities have already occurred on the Arizona side, due, so I am advised by Inspector Stinson, to a lack of supervision and inspection as to the safety of men and proper working conditions.

On the contrary, but two fatalities have happened on the Nevada side, although there are more than five times as many employees on our side of the line, due to the close inspection and enforcement of our safety laws.

I know of no reason why specific legislation should not be enacted authorizing the States of Arizona and Nevada to enforce the State laws for the protection of labor, for their industrial protection, and allowing the States to assess privately owned property found within the bounds of such reservation, and giving the States authority to enter upon the reservation at any and all times without let or hindrance.

I will be glad to keep you advised of the progress of litigation, but hope that the necessary amending legislation can be enacted, which will take the entire matter out of the hands of the court and give the States the right to enforce their laws.

If the hands of the States are to be tied by injunction pending hearings in court, appeals from decisions at the convenience of interested attorneys, awaiting judgments in the matter, one can be very sure that the entire Boulder Canyon project will be completed before a final decision is rendered by the courts.

You have my cordial good wishes for success in the entire matter, and I shall be glad to have you keep me advised of the progress being made.

With my personal well wishes, I am,

Very truly yours,

F. B. BALZAR, Governor.

NOVEMBER 27, 1931.

Hon. FRED B. BALZAR,
Governor of Nevada, Carson City, Nev.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR BALZAR: I want to thank you for your letter of the 24th instant and assure you that I appreciate your splendid cooperation in making available your views and suggestions in regard to necessary amendments to the Boulder Dam act in order fully to protect the interests of the State of Nevada.

I have just written a letter to the Secretary of the Interior requesting his assistance in formulating the necessary amendments to carry into effect the suggestions which both you and I have made. I inclose a copy for your information and will keep you posted on developments.

With every good wish, I remain,

Very sincerely yours,

TASKER L. ODDIE.

NOVEMBER 27, 1931.

Hon. RAY LYMAN WILBUR,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In further reference to my letter to you of October 26, 1931, and your reply of November 2, relating to legislation affecting the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation, I addressed a letter to the Hon. Fred B. Balzar, Governor of the State of Nevada, on November 19, 1931, a copy of which is herewith inclosed, also a copy of the governor's reply dated November 24.

I wish particularly to call your attention to the fact that Governor Balzar fully concurs in the suggestions which I set forth in paragraph 4 of my letter to him of November 19, as follows:

"In order fully to protect the interests of the State of Nevada, it is my view that the Boulder Dam Act should be so amended that the Government would be obliged to provide for the construction and maintenance of adequate school and recreational facilities on the reservation; to establish definitely the right of qualified residents on the reservation to vote; and the right of the State and county to assess private property for purposes of taxation."

In addition to the above suggestions, the governor, in his letter to me of November 24, called attention to the need for amending the Boulder Canyon project act so as to extend the State labor, safety, and industrial insurance laws to the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation, in order that the lives of those engaged in the construction work might be fully safeguarded.

I appreciate your letter of November 2 in which you offer to cooperate in the consideration and preparation of legislation to meet these suggestions. It will be helpful if you will supply me with drafts of the necessary amendments to the Boulder Canyon project act which will carry into effect my suggestions and those of the Governor of the State of Nevada.

I am sure you will agree with me that the early enactment of such clarifying amendments will aid substantially in insuring the welfare and safety of the workers, in expediting construction, and in maintaining that harmonious cooperation between the State and the Federal Government, which is so essential to ultimate success.

Very sincerely yours,

TASKER L. ODDIE.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 5, 1931.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR ODDIE: This is in acknowledgment of your letter of November 27 regarding proposed additional legislation affecting the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation. The legislation proposed would embody the following provisions:

(a) Provide for construction and maintenance of adequate school and recreational facilities on the reservation;

(b) Establish definitely the rights of qualified residents on the reservation to vote;

(c) Empower the State and county to assess private property for purposes of taxation; and

(d) Extend the State labor, safety, and industrial insurance laws to the reservation.

I am wholly in accord with provision (a), and it is the intention to suggest incorporation in the appropriation act for 1933 provision giving necessary authority in this respect. This would be a provision substantially in accord with many others sanctioned by long practice. The Comptroller General has held that funds appropriated and now available may be used for construction of certain school buildings, and such construction is now being undertaken. Instructions have been issued that this work be expedited in every possible way.

I have no objection to residents of the reservation being permitted to vote, although my information is that this is a departure from the usual practice incident to reservations over which exclusive jurisdiction is exercised by the United States. Many of the residents of the reservation, because of the nature of their employment, are, and will be, temporary, and many of them probably will not reside on the reservation for a sufficient length of time to qualify as electors under the State laws.

I am advised that two separate suits are now pending in the United States District Court for the District of Nevada by the Six Companies—one against the assessor of Clark County and the other against the State inspector of mines, affecting provisions (c) and (d). The Department of Justice, on recommendation of this department, has instructed the United States attorney for Nevada to investigate the situation and to take such action as may be found necessary to protect the rights and interests of the United States. Additional legislation at this time would influence not only the rights and obligations of the United States, but those also of the contractor. It occurs to me that it might be advisable to withhold action on the matter of further legislation until the United States attorney has completed his investigation and the Attorney General has advised this department of the action considered necessary in connection with the pending litigation. The two interdependent matters could then be better correlated.

I deeply appreciate your proffered cooperation, of which I shall be glad to take advantage when the situation has been clarified to such an extent that the attitude properly to be taken by this department can be more clearly defined.

Very truly yours,

RAY LYMAN WILBUR.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1931

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Father, we are always encompassed by Thy unfailing goodness; it stills the trembling soul and hushes the most poignant fear. It is Thy answer to the doubting heart; therefore, may we look up, love Thee, and rejoice. Awaken among us more and more a mutual feeling and understanding, thus helping us to recognize that common need which makes us one. Whether the tide of Thy purpose flows sluggishly or free and swift, let us hasten that hour for which we long to see, when a deeper consciousness of national horizons and a finer sense of obligation shall spring from the breast of our entire citizenship. Do Thou lay the wondrous spell of Thy Spirit upon us and win Thy widening way by Thy compelling wisdom. Amen.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

PERMISSION TO COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 49

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations and the subcommittees thereof are authorized to sit during the sessions and recesses of the present Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

ENTRY INTO THE UNITED STATES OF PARTICIPANTS AND OFFICIALS OF THE THIRD OLYMPIC WINTER GAMES

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution No. 72, to permit the temporary entry into the United States, under certain conditions, of alien participants and officials of the Third Olympic Winter Games and of the games of the Tenth Olympiad, to be held in the United States in 1932.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That alien participants, officials, and other accredited members of delegations to the Third Olympic Winter Games and to the games of the Tenth Olympiad to be held in the United States in 1932, and members of the immediate families and servants of the foregoing, all the foregoing who are nonimmigrants, if otherwise admissible into the United States under the immigration laws, shall be exempted from the payment of the tax of $8 prescribed by section 2 of the immigration act of 1917, and exempted from the fees prescribed under the law to be collected in connection with executing an application for a visa and visaing the passport, or other travel document, of an alien for the purpose of entering the United States as a nonimmigrant, and such aliens shall not be required to present official passports issued by the governments to which they owe allegiance: Provided, That such aliens shall be in possession of official Olympic games identity cards duly visaed without charge by American consular officers abroad: And provided further, That such aliens shall comply with regulations not inconsistent with the foregoing provisions which shall be prescribed by the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of State: Provided, however, That nothing herein shall relieve an alien from being required to obtain a gratis nonimmigrant visa if coming to the United States as a nonimmigrant, or an immigration visa if coming to the United States as an immigrant: Be it further

Resolved, That such aliens shall be permitted the free entry of their personal effects and their equipment to be used in connection with the games, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the present House joint resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM]. There is no provision whatever in the resolution for the sure return to their respective countries of the parties who are to come here under this resolution.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is limited to the time of the games.

Mr. BLANTON. I understand, but there are some restrictions and check-ups that the Government has with respect to regular passports; which are not required as to these parties. A horde of them could come into the United States ostensibly to attend the games and then remain here. They could scatter over the United States, and there is no way of checking up on them.

Mr. SNELL. May I have about two minutes to explain it to the gentleman? I think I can answer his question.

Mr. BLANTON. I was asking the gentleman from Maryland, on the majority side, who has charge of this matter. In times past I had to ask the gentleman from New York, but, fortunately, I can ask the gentleman on my own side now.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I may say that while there are no passports required, yet they must have cards from the consuls abroad.

Mr. BLANTON. Will there be provision, under this regulation made by our Immigration Department, to see that they all get out of here when the games are over?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Oh, absolutely. Their names will be taken and cards issued to them just as though they were passports, except that they will not be charged for them.

Mr. BLANTON. They come across the river down in my State, from Mexico, over the various international bridges on the Rio Grande, and it is a hard thing to keep check on them. It is hard to get them out of here after doing what they came over here to do.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman can not blame them for wanting to stay here.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not blaming them, but I am thinking of the 6,000,000 heads of families in the United States now without jobs, who do not want people coming in here and taking their places on work.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] to explain the resolution.

Mr. SNELL. As most of the Members know, for the first time the Olympic games are to be held in the United States next year; the winter Olympic games at Lake Placid, N. Y., in February, and the summer Olympics at Los Angeles in August, I believe. Heretofore the nation that has been host to these Olympic games has extended to the participants from foreign nations exactly what it is proposed to extend to these people at the present time coming into the United States. No man will be allowed to come here unless he is certified by the Olympic commission, or his government, that he is a participant and connected with the games.

It is expected that representatives from about 23 or 25 countries will be here and, all told, there will be in the vicinity of 500 participants at the games; but there will be a complete record of everything connected with them, and all of the regulations of the Immigration Department will be put into effect, except that they will not have to pay for getting their passports visaed, and they will not have to pay any customs duties on the various utensils and equipment used in connection with the games.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. I notice the resolution provides something that is very unusual, that is, that their families and their servants shall come with them under this same exemption. It hardly seems reasonable that a man should come here to attend the Olympic games and be permitted to bring with him without limitation his family and a bunch of servants.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman allow me to state these people always bring their own cooks with them. They prepare and eat their own native food.

This resolution was prepared by the State Department, the Labor Department, and the Treasury Department, and it is intended to meet every emergency that can possibly arise in bringing these people in and getting them out. It simply extends to them courtesies that we have had extended to us by foreign countries.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. Of course, the servants that come with them would be under the same regulation, and go back?

Mr. SNELL. Absolutely. There is no question of doubt as far as that is concerned.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I notice that each one must be otherwise admissible. I take it, however, that that is applicable to the physical requirements?

Mr. SNELL. I take it so.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And that no team from any country would be excluded by reason of their citizenship?

Mr. SNELL. No, sir.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is, it is to afford every country an opportunity to send their contestants to take part?

Mr. SNELL. It is simply to extend the same courtesies that every other nation which has been host to these Olympic games has extended to every other nation of the world.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am sure everybody is in sympathy with the resolution. My curiosity is aroused by the provision that these aliens shall not be required to present official passports isssued by the government to which they owe allegiance. What is the purpose of that exemption?

Mr. SNELL. They present in its place a certificate from the authorized Olympic commissions of the various countries, and that is used as a passport.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the gentleman will permit, quite an expense would be involved if they were required to secure passports from their own countries.

Mr. SNELL. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the phraseology of the resolution it would seem that they could not get the visa of their own government to leave the country.

Mr. SNELL. No. This will all come under the Olympic commission, and the Olympic commission is recognized by the government; but we do not have any such commission in our country. As far as I know, there is no opposition on the part of anyone. This is agreed to by the departments and the Executive.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

ARMISTICE DAY ADDRESS AT ROANOKE, VA., BY BRIG. GEN. FRANK T. HINES

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an Armistice Day address delivered by General Hines.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, under leave granted me to extend my remarks I herewith insert an address of Brig. Gen. Frank T. Hines, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, at Roanoke, Va., November 11, 1931.

The address is as follows:

Fellow citizens, friends, Virginians, it is not alone a distinct pleasure to come to you here to-day, but an inspiration to be privileged on this historic anniversary to address the people of a State which has given more of history to our Union than almost any State in it; a State whose hallowed battlefields and prosperous farm lands bear silent testimony to her courage and industry; a State whose people have known the depths of sorrow and sacrifice, and from them risen to the heights of success and security through their own indefatigable efforts and the indomitable spirit which has characterized them from the earliest days of the colony.

The Nation is indebted eternally to Virginia for the eight distinguished sons she has given to the Presidency and the countless others who have contributed so much to the establishment and maintenance of our Nation. The Nation and our Allies in Europe are indebted to her for the nearly 86,000 soldiers, sailors, and marines she furnished to help make this day one of the most memorable in the history of the whole world—Armistice Day.

Thirteen years ago to-day, upon a world torn with the tumult of war, there descended the most momentous silence the world has ever known—the pulsating, prophetic silence of the armistice.

Four long, torturing years of fury and flame of war had torn its way across the homelands and made a battlefield of Europe, leaving in its wake death, destruction, and desolation. More than a score of countries had signified their allegiances in the conflict and the detonations of battle reverberated to the far parts of the earth in vibrations of hatred, sorrow, and pain.

Upon such a scene of turbulence came the benison of a visible and audible peace, and with it the gratitude and rejoicing of millions of people all over the world.

Comingling with our reverent remembrance of the honored dead this gratitude and rejoicing are reflected each succeeding year in the celebration of Armistice Day, a tribute to the cause of peace.

In the years which have passed much progress has been made toward the prevention of war; by pact, treaty, and agreement it has been divested of its former prestige, but it has not yet been made impossible nor even improbable. In fact, it is entirely possible that the unrest of to-day at home and abroad is significant of the weakness in the structure of peace built immediately following the Great War.

It would seem the causes of war are innate as the baser attributes of human nature and just as ineradicable, but at least they are equally susceptible of a certain degree of control, and in the intelligent and conscious adherence to the tenets of good citizenship will be found the rudiments of such control.

Good citizenship necessarily connotes love of country and reverence for its laws; recognition of civic duties, and defense of country in time of war, but it should also include not only proper respect for the rights and property of others but a decent consideration for the feelings of our fellow men, a consideration suffused with unselfishness. Such a spirit of good citizenship, of patriotism and unselfishness was exemplified by those who served in the World War, and we honor them to-day anew; but remembrance is not enough. With each recurring Armistice Day there should be a renewed determination against war and a conscious, active striving toward a lasting peace.

To most of those men who served in the World War memory alone should suffice to keep before them the lessons of war, but for all of us who are prone to forget too quickly and for the coming generations, to whom the war will be but hearsay and history, there must be definite and vigorous efforts toward the establishment of a national spirit intolerant of war and of policies and methods which will eliminate the causes of war before there can be any stable enthronement of peace.

To me, the most common source of war and strife is born of selfishness in its numberless forms. It may manifest itself in greed, in desire for conquest, in competitive effort which contemplates the complete annihilation of its opponent, or less actively, merely in utter indifference to or lack of consideration of the rights and feelings of others—in any form and under any circumstances it is pernicious and detrimental reciprocally both to those from whom it emanates and those whom it actively affects.

It might be well to give some time to introspection in an effort to determine whether selfishness is not possibly becoming rather predominantly a national trait in some directions. We have been accused of it from a number of sources; in connection with the war itself, before our active participation; and since, in the various negotiations incident to its cessation, we have been credited with an attitude of aloofness not entirely geographical and an indifference not unmixed with complacence.

I do not believe that this criticism is justified, but I can understand, as I am sure most Americans can, the basis for the European viewpoint about us. Our country is unique in many features. Not only topographically, but politically and physically we have certain qualities of space, freedom, and national independence of other countries not to be found elsewhere in the whole world, and it is not only natural but inevitable that such an environment should be reflected more or less in our mental processes and in our activities. But it is well to take care lest independence mount into arrogance, and self-reliance deteriorate into self-sufficiency.

Born and bred in an atmosphere of national independence and security, the international difficulties of European countries are remote and unfamiliar to us, and we are inclined to be intolerant of them; but I believe a little more interest in their problems on the part of our people individually would not only bring about more sympathetic understanding and unselfish tolerance for their situations but could not fail to impress upon us more emphatically than ever the desirability and necessity of active endeavor for the establishment and maintenance of a permanent peace in all lands.

Unless and until the burdens of war can be imposed upon those groups who make war, it will continue to occur. The aftermath of war is a veritable legacy of hatred and resentment left to the generations following such conflicts, and the spirit of war is thus kept alive to flame anew at the first opportunity. It is inevitable under such conditions. It is the conditions which must be changed if we would put an end to wars.

It is not possible that such changes can be wrought by treaties or pacts alone. New ideals, aspirations, and resolves must be established in the minds and hearts of the peoples of the world; a positive urge to peace must be fostered and developed until the mental attitude of the nations themselves becomes definitely determined against war.

It is difficult to understand, but it seems necessary to emphasize the blessings of peace; as we read daily of the unrest and upheavals in various parts of the world, it is evident that the lessons of the Great War are still unlearned or else too easily forgotten, and in each succeeding question at issue between nations discussions in the press almost inevitably and invariably suggest or hint at the possibility of further war. The important phase of this situation is not that these suggestions may be given too much credence, but it is indicative of the national mind that it appears still to turn to the thought of warfare as the natural remedy for the settlement of international differences.

Our recent honored visitor, Premier Laval of France, in connection with the proposal of his compatriot Briand for the formation of a "United States of Europe" is quoted in the press as stressing the interdependence of the European countries as a natural basis for such a union. Certainly it is obvious that an intrinsic community of interest exists among them to a very great extent, without volition on their part, and it is well within the realm of possibility that this particular factor might become a compelling force looking toward the initiation of such a coalition.

But to succeed and to endure any confederacy of countries must have its roots grounded in something deeper than expediency, and its purposes must contemplate something more comprehensive than mere self-preservation and economic or industrial advantage. We know that our own country was founded through community and unity of interest and ideals and developed by a stalwart patriotism that held the duties and privileges of citizenship as an inevitable and individual responsibilty. Only too well did the early Colonies know how inexorable was the principle embodied in the phrase, "United we stand, divided we fall"; and in those urgent and strenuous times consistent participation in civic responsibilities on the part of the citizenry was indispensable to the development and maintenance of the independence they established.

But such unity, it seems to me, can be possible only between peoples having common bonds of interest and, broadly, common standards and ideals. In order to bind and hold the Union we have built, it has been and always will be necessary to educate in our traditions and ideals the foreign born who come to our shores with the idea of becoming citizens, before they can be actually made citizens in the fuller sense of that capacity. One of the most important of these traditions is our adherence to a program of peace whenever such a position can be maintained with honor, and I believe that this doctrine of peace could well be given much more emphasis among our own native born as well, in furtherance of an urge to peace sufficiently strong to counteract the impulse toward war.

That this impulse is steadily growing more and more repugnant to the more advanced nations is evident on every hand in utterances of representative people. Referring to the recent convention of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League, Gen. Sir Arthur Currie, grand president of the league, says: "I know they will approve of every honorable method or means to make war improbable. One of our dearest hopes during the last Great War—the one that most sustained us in those tragic days—was that our efforts, if successful, would put an end to all war. For that hundreds of thousands of men sacrificed home, health, fortune, and life. Let us try to win peace."

And in his greeting to the convention General Currie said: "There was never a time in the world's history when there was such an urgent need for straight thinking, for sound judgment, for unselfish action, for cooperation and mutual trust, for courage and calm faith as there is to-day. * * * Strange and menacing forces are working in our world. The most sacred traditions for which our fathers struggled and for which our comrades died are being attacked with scorn. The root of discontent is, as a rule, injustice or greed or cruelty. In their place must arise unselfishness and justice and mutual trust, the qualities that characterized our army in war days. Let us still adhere to these qualities and we can face the future without fear."

Every word of this is true of our own country to-day, but it is not a new condition. The need for national vigilance to preserve national integrity has been plainly recognized by patriots since the inception of our country and the responsibility for its maintenance goes straight to the citizenry. Americans are devoted to their country and in every emergency ready in her defense to the fullest measure, but in times of peace we are prone to lapse into a habit of belittlement of those high in public office responsible for the maintenance of the institutions we have adopted as the fundamentals of our Government, and our interest in the maintenance and progress of these institutions at times wanes to the point of indifference, or at least to inaction.

It is not that we have ceased to be conscious of evils that are prevalent. We discuss them, we criticize those whom we consider more or less responsible for their existence; but we ignore or neglect our opportunities for remedial action by exercising to the fullest the privilege of suffrage. Too few of us recognize in suffrage one of the most important obligations of citizenship. Many a man who would instantly resent any implication of a lack of patriotism on his part will complacently explain that he hasn't voted for years because he was dissatisfied with the way things were going. In other words, he loves his country, but his patriotism has been on a long vacation when it should have been diligently employed.

Your own Patrick Henry said "America can only be undone by herself," and if we are to continue as the great Nation that we have a right to be, it is necessary that there be developed among our people a greater interest in public affairs, a greater appreciation of the value of citizenship. This work should commence in the schoolroom. Too little importance is now placed upon the initial impression given to the children of America. The importance of the work of those engaged in teaching the children of America and carrying on the education of the youth through the graded schools can not be overestimated. These first impressions are lasting and are reflected most surely in after years. The proper spirit of Americanism should have its inception there, together with lessons in respect for law and order. More attention must be given to the establishment of those high ideals so essential in the development of the true and patriotic citizen of our country. Young America should be taught to love America, to support its Constitution and laws; learn that the violation of its laws is to trample upon all that is good and that is distinctive of those high ideals fought for by the fathers of our Nation.

Next to love of country should come the respect for our institutions; respect for those who are charged with the responsibility of government. How can we expect that the proper spirit of citizenship will prevail if we are to ridicule those charged with the making as well as the execution of our laws? It is of equal importance, of course, that those selected for public service should inspire that confidence essential to demand proper respect. It is of further importance that our citizens take that interest in the affairs of their country—whether it be city, State, or National—that they may be assured that those selected to conduct the business of government for them are properly selected and are representatives to whom they can give that respect and confidence so essential to good government.

In all matters affecting the country nationally, I believe that there is need and opportunity for better teamwork among our people, a broader viewpoint and more generous disposition to reconcile local differences, and to give-and-take in the interest of unity on national matters. The welfare of the Nation as a nation should be paramount always; State lines and individual or group interests should be forgotten when the issue is a national one.

Our former President, Calvin Coolidge, most aptly expressed this important principle when he said:

"Our country and its Government belong to all the people. It ought not to be under the domination of any one element or any one section. For it to fall under the entire control of the people of wealth or people who are wage earners, would be contrary to our declared principles. They should all be partakers in the responsibilities and benefits, and all be represented in the administration of our Government. Those who are charged with the conduct of our affairs should be equally solicitous for the welfare of all localities and all classes. There should be no outlaws and no favorites, but all should be beneficiaries of the common good through the discharge of common duties."

These are the responsibilities and benefits to be expected of good government. There can be no compromise in our standard of citizenship. There must be no dilution in the quality of our Americanism. Depreciate the value of our Americanism and you will correspondingly lower our standard of government and weaken its powers of defense in time of emergency.

As I have pointed out before, the men and women who have served and sacrificed in defense of their country, as those of the late Great War, exemplified the spirit of good citizenship, as have all those who have given similar service in all our wars, and the Nation has been consistently and constantly solicitous in their behalf, giving gladly and generously in recognition of their service and their needs.

This sense of national obligation to veterans had its inception in the minds of our people when, in 1636, the Plymouth Colony enacted in their court that if any man who was sent forth as a soldier should return maimed, he should be maintained competently by the Colony as long as he lived, subsequently to be taken up by the Continental Congress in 1776 and by nearly every Congress since, until to-day no nation can claim to have done more for those who have given service in times of great emergency. Time will not permit to detail the benefits extended. We may summarize them in this way:

More than 300,000 World War veterans are in receipt of compensation benefits for disabilities resulting from military or naval service.

More than 141,000 dependents of veterans who died in service or since of service-connected disabilities are in receipt of compensation.

More than 275,000 World War veterans are in receipt of allowances for disabilities not shown to have been due to military or naval service.

More than 450,000 veterans and dependents of veterans of other wars are in receipt of pension benefits.

More than 6,000 former emergency officers are in receipt of retirement pay, having been retired for permanent disabilities of service origin.

More than 41,000 veterans are being given medical care in hospitals under the supervision of the Veterans' Administration and over 21,000 are being cared for in the barracks and hospitals of our national homes.

Since March, 1919, the Congress has authorized in eight general acts appropriations of over $113,000,000 for hospital construction, and in special acts, nearly four and one-half millions more for new domiciliary and hospital facilities in soldiers' homes.

The Veterans' Administration now has 41,199 hospital beds available and upon completion of our present program we will have about 52,000 hospital beds in veteran hospitals and soldiers' homes.

The significance in these figures is that direct benefits are currently being disbursed to more than 1,000,000 of our citizens, veterans or dependents, and this number does not include additional beneficiaries of insurance or adjusted compensation.

Summarizing the Nation's efforts in behalf of the veteran, in financial terms, we find that already there have been disbursed over $14,000,000,000, and the volume and scope of veteran relief will inevitably increase as more veterans become incapacitated either from disease or the infirmities of age and need assistance from their Government.

We pray God that we may never again be forced to draw the sword; we deplore the loss of the splendid young lives that the Great War entailed. But we are proud of the courage that inspired the men of America; we are proud of the self-sacrifice with which they submitted themselves to discipline that their courage might be effective; we are proud of their success in the great struggle, and while according to them the gratitude and honor they have earned and maintaining liberally our efforts in their behalf, our part now is to strive with the utmost fidelity and devotion for the establishment of a lasting peace, an eternal Armistice Day, that their service and sacrifices may not have been in vain.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE GEORGE S. GRAHAM

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, among the valued and distinguished Members of the last Congress who, to our deep sorrow, have passed away since its adjournment was our esteemed colleague GEORGE S. GRAHAM. I do not intend at this time to pay a tribute to his memory, because at some suitable time, in accordance with our beautiful custom, we will commemorate his passing and that of other Members of the House who have joined the "silent majority" in recent months. I am only rising to say that on December 2, last, the bar of Philadelphia held a meeting in honor of Mr. GRAHAM. I was honored by being asked to pay one of the tributes to his memory, and especially to dwell upon his services as legislator. I now ask permission to incorporate in these remarks the tribute that I at that time paid to Mr. GRAHAM as legislator.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The tribute referred to follows:

My brethren of the Philadelphia bar, it is with a feeling of solemn pride that I accepted the invitation to pay a tribute to the memory of our departed friend and brother. I was deeply touched when I learned that such was his wish, if a bar meeting were held in his memory. The wish that he expressed I regard as the last but not the least precious evidence of his friendship.

Among the last social functions that our friend ever attended, and possibly the very last, was a dinner which I gave in his honor in my Washington home a few days before the close of the last Congress. It was attended by many of the leading men of Congress, and there were so many manifestations of admiration and affection for Mr. GRAHAM by men of both political parties that he must have realized that he had gained, after a long and arduous life, those just accompaniments of an honored age, "Love, honor, obedience—troops of friends."

As we mourn to-day the peculiar loss which the historic bar of Philadelphia has sustained in the passing of this sound lawyer and able advocate, it is natural that the preceding speeches have largely dealt with Mr. GRAHAM'S career as a member of that bar. This, however, was only a part of his long and useful life. A fine sense of civic duty prompted him at the very height of his career at the bar and the maturity of his intellectual powers to give in large part his remaining years to the service of the Nation. Cicero once said, "Such as are the leading men of the state, such is the state itself," and I am one of those who believe that our form of government can not endure, and that the great traditions of our fathers will inevitably perish, unless the ablest men of America are willing to give their service to the State. Such was Mr. GRAHAM'S conception of his duty, and it doubtless was at a great sacrifice to his material prospects that he entered Congress in the year 1913 and served until the end of his life.

Let me, therefore, as one of his colleagues in the House of Representatives, dwell upon the legislative services of GEORGE S. GRAHAM, and as the legislator, even when a layman, becomes a part of that great organ of human society which we call the law, my brief discussion of our departed friend's career in Congress is not inappropriate to a meeting of the bar.

Mr. GRAHAM was elected to the Sixty-third Congress in the year 1913, and his legislative career began with a notable oratorical triumph.

Early in the year 1914, that fateful year, Mr. GRAHAM sought to have the House of Representatives pass, under a suspension of the rules, a bill to remove certain penalties which had been imposed upon those graduates of West Point who later had served in the Confederate Army during the Civil War. It could only be considered by unanimous consent, and the Republican floor leader, a man of powerful will and tenacious judgment, intimated that he would object. Mr. GRAHAM then importuned Mr. Mann to withhold his objection until Mr. GRAHAM could speak. Mr. GRAHAM then delivered a very eloquent speech on reconciliation between the North and the South. Let it be remembered that he was born in that fateful year 1850, when Clay, Webster, and Calhoun were making their last attempt to save the Union from civil war by a futile compromise, and that as a young man he had lived through the tragic passions of that most fratricidal conflict. The Civil War neither began with Sumter nor ended with Appomatox, and we can still remember the passionate feelings of sectional strife which persisted long after the day when Lee placed his sword in the hand of the chivalrous Grant.

Mr. GRAHAM desired to remove the last vestige of that bitter feeling, and his speech, which was heard with rapt attention by the House of Representatives, was so persuasive and moving that the bill, immediately after he had spoken, was passed by unanimous vote. The speech concluded with a statement that was at once a coincidence and a prophecy. He was speaking on June 29, 1914, and the civilized world, although it knew it not, was on the brink of the greatest catastrophe of modern times, and perhaps of all time, for on the day before a pistol shot had been heard in the streets of Sarajevo, and before the last reverberation had ended, the whole world was lapped in the universal flame of war such as marked in Wagner's grim trilogy, the Twilight of the Gods for our civilization. Mr. GRAHAM eloquently referred to the fact that in a cemetery that he had once visited in New Orleans he had found the graves of men who wore both the blue and the gray, and then he prophetically concluded as follows:

"That scene will be repeated, perhaps, who knows, in the history of our country when we war with some foreign foe, and the man of the North and the man of the South, one in heart, one in courage, one in valor, will fight with each other in defense of every city and every foot of land in our blessed Republic."

In little more than a month the great catastrophe, anticipated by thoughtful men for many years, had come, and a few years later the men of the North and the South, between whom our departed friend was then seeking a final reconciliation, were lying in common graves in the valley of the Marne or in the wooded region of the Argonne.

The work of Congress is very largely the work of its committees, and Mr. GRAHAM'S greatest usefulness was not on the floor of the House but in the committee room. His great reputation as a lawyer, naturally, prompted his selection as a member of the powerful Judiciary Committee, and as a member of that committee, and later its chairman, he served for 19 years. Time would not permit me to speak at any length of his great service on this committee. No Member was more untiring than he in the study of proposed legislation. Naturally, the subjects on which he was obliged to pass were varied and often complex in character. Let me illustrate by taking a single Congress—the Seventieth. The committee was obliged to consider 482 proposed modifications of the law, and of these it reported favorably 113, and of these 66 became laws. The most useful work that he did was not in passing new legislation but in restricting the spirit of mad innovation which prompts a large body of Representatives to tinker with the laws. Therefore, we would measure his public service in this respect not by the fact that of 482 legislative proposals in a single Congress 66 finally became laws but that over 400 of these proposals were examined by the committee and rejected.

It would be superfluous to dwell upon the notable service that he rendered in changing the jurisdictional power of the Supreme Court, and, incidentally, giving the hard-worked and underpaid judiciary reasonable compensation. The Supreme Court recognized his invaluable service in this respect when it not only sent one of its number to the great dinner that was given by the bar of Philadelphia for Mr. GRAHAM on February 18, 1927, but also by the most generous recognition by the then Chief Justice of Mr. GRAHAM'S great service to the court in relieving it of its then impossible burden of a too-congested calendar.

Candor compels me to add a statement. The bill was formulated at the instance of the Supreme Court and had its powerful imprimatur. I was then Acting Attorney General of the United States, and when, pursuant to custom, the President sent the bill as finally passed to the Department of Justice for its opinion as to whether the President should approve or veto, I advised the President that I thought the bill was a too drastic restriction of the jurisdiction of the court, but that he would not be justified, in view of the Supreme Court's wish and the large vote in its favor in Congress, to veto the bill, and therefore it should be submitted to the test of experience. I believed then, and I believe now, that it is not wise to allow the Supreme Court such a wide and almost unlimited discretion to determine without oral argument whether it will grant the right to appeal in nearly all litigated cases. However, I recognize that at that time it was a condition and not a theory that confronted the courts, and the condition was a calendar beyond the power of the Supreme Court to dispose of without inordinate delays, and that its vain attempt to give to each litigant his day in court without such delay necessitated a denial in many cases of the opportunity for adequate argument. Moreover, the law in question was demanded not so much by sound theory as by imperative necessity.

Mr. GRAHAM was a very able chairman of the important Judiciary Committee, and it is a privilege to make a record of the profound respect which the members of that committee, without respect to party, had for its chairman. I can not speak from personal knowledge, as I am not a member of that committee, but I have taken pains to ask a number of its members to favor me with their estimate of Mr. GRAHAM'S service as chairman. One member replied that "he was one of the most energetic and persistent chairmen that ever graced that position on the Judiciary Committee."

Another wrote me:

"The thing which impressed me most about Mr. GRAHAM was his thoroughness. Everything was important to him, the little things as well as the big. He was a prodigious worker and could dispatch more work than anyone I ever met. Every piece of legislation coming from the Judiciary Committee while he was chairman had his personal attention, except, of course, during a few times he was absent because of illness. He insisted upon a study, and a thorough study, of all important legislation which passed before his committee. Some of his arguments and discussions before the committee were masterly. He prepared to present his point of view to the committee with the same thoroughness as an important case before a court."

Another member wrote me:

"He was at all times the essence of dignity and fairness in presiding over the deliberations of the committee. No matter what his personal views were, he never let them prejudice him in his conduct in conducting the affairs of the committee. His outstanding characteristic as chairman, to my mind, was his idealism of purpose in respect to legislation. No man revered the Constitution nor had a more profound respect for the judicial branch of our Government than he."

Another member, a distinguished Democrat, thus wrote me:

"He was ever genial and eminently fair. It was sometimes very difficult for him to control the committee, some of whose members held views so in disaccord with his own. By sheer force of intellect, coupled with diplomacy and tact, he steered the committee deliberations through dangerous shoals. Toward all he exhibited a fairness in ruling born only of a saintly patience and a keen sense of the responsibility of his office."

This tribute to his "saintly patience" suggests to me that which must have impressed Mr. GRAHAM'S friends in his later years. His character underwent a transformation, which is not usual with advancing years. In the early and middle periods of his life he was a born fighter; aggressiveness was a part of his nature. Standing erect with his fine presence, his resonant voice, his naturally combative mind, he was a foeman of unquestionable power. In later years this aggressiveness yielded to a beautiful gentleness of character. After the storm and stress of his life there came this "light at eventide," a kindly light which illuminated the encircling gloom of advancing years. Although his years and distinguished career alike inspired respect for his views, he was modest in expressing them. He never dogmatized with an "I am Sir Oracle" manner, and if he differed with you it was with a gentleness of spirit that blended his fortiter in re with a suaviter in modo. If he conferred with anyone he seemed solicitous to get the other man's opinion, and if he differed with it it was generally in silence. An exquisite modesty of mind characterized him, for with him it was old age, "frosty but kindly." There is no finer word in the English language than the word "gentleman." Was it not the old Elizabethan dramatist Dekker who said that Christ was the first of gentlemen? Need I, on the eve of Christmas, remind you that Thackeray, in a noble Christmas poem, written shortly before his death, acclaimed the gentleman and quoted the refrain of the angels on that first of Christmas nights of "Peace on earth to men of gentle will"?

If I am called upon to single out the trait of our departed brother's character in his later years which most impressed me, it was this gentleness of mind which, so far as I can recall, caused him to refrain from any unkind comment as to any of his colleagues, even though in times of heated debate some, occasionally, may have given him ample provocation. He reminded me, in this respect, of that finest scholar in politics of our time, Lord Balfour, who was the most ingratiating listener and the most perfect gentleman with whom I have ever come into contact.

Such was the spirit of GEORGE GRAHAM.

Let me recur to the words of one of his colleagues, which I have already quoted, wherein he said, "No man revered the Constitution nor had a more profound respect for the judiciary than he." I repeat this simply to emphasize that our friend's last and greatest service to his day and generation was his vigorous defense of our form of Government. His position was a trying one in this respect, for at times a large majority of the Judiciary Committee, composed of both parties, were not in sympathy with his old-fashioned views as to the wisdom of the fathers. The great compact between the States as to the basis of apportionment in the House of Representatives was sought to be nullified by many of his colleagues in order that by the exclusion of aliens from the basis of the apportionment some 25 seats would be transferred from the industrial to the agricultural States. At Mr. GRAHAM'S request, I appeared before the Judiciary Committee and argued against these proposed changes in our form of Government, which seem to me revolutionary in the sense that they violated the original compact of our Government. It was Mr. GRAHAM who in the last Congress held back this attempt to shift political power from the industrial to the agricultural States, and while this proposed twentieth amendment attraced too little attention at the time, yet our departed brother's service in preventing this new attempt to tinker with the Constitution and to destroy the constitutional edifice erected by the fathers may well be regarded as one of the great services of his career.

His respect for the Constitution was for the Constitution to which is subscribed the names of Washington, Franklin, Madison, Hamiliton, Wilson, and others; but Mr. GRAHAM, I believe, thought that not every subsequent amendment of later generations was so sacrosanct that the American people should be denied the opportunity to discuss its merits. On his own initiative he began hearings on February 12, 1930, as to the various legislative proposals to ameliorate or repeal the eighteenth amendment. His opening speech made a deep impression among the public mind. He said:

"Let us reason together. Not with the fanatic, for he is the foe of religious as well as individual liberty. Not with him, no; but with broad-minded men and women of every faith and belief, and try to relieve our country through reason and by conceiving a new system—one not founded on the bludgeon and a violation of men's conscientious convictions regarding drink. No law can ever be enforced that is destructive of right and individual liberty. You may create a guerrilla warfare and conditions reeking with murder, bribery, corruption, violations or evasions, and disrespect for all law. Every law to be capable of being enforced without such a train of consequences must not be inconsistent with the mind of the people of the country as being right, and must not be destructive of individual liberty."

I wish that time permitted a much more adequate statement of his great services as a Member of the House of Representatives, but I trust enough has been said to show that he worthily represented the great city of Philadelphia in the councils of the Nation. At some appropriate time the House of Representatives will meet to mourn the passing of this illustrious public servant, and at that time there will be a much fuller and more eloquent expression of his service as legislator than I could make at this time.

Moreover, the thought that is uppermost in our minds is not chiefly his work as a legislator or his career as a lawyer. We mourn the passing of a friend. No more shall we see that erect form, that attractive personality, or hear that resonant voice or feel the kindly clasp of his hand. Of all the tragedies of life the saddest is that of the "vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still." To those of us who were privileged to know him he will not be forgotten while we have that power of memory, which to some extent mitigates the tragedy of death.

For myself, I mourn a good friend and a valued colleague, and can simply say, "Ave et vale."

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ALBERT MAY TODD

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, a few days ago there died in the city of Kalamazoo a former Member of this House, Hon. Albert May Todd. Mr. Todd was one of the most distinguished men in the third congressional district of Michigan at the time of his death. He was elected to the Congress of the United States in 1896. That year Mr. Bryan carried the third congressional district, and Mr. Todd was elected on a coalition ticket of the Prohibitionists, the silver Republicans, and the Democrats. He served but one term in the House of Representatives, but his term here was distinguished, able, and to the great satisfaction of those who knew him, as I did during my youth.

Mr. Todd was a patron of the arts, a patron of the sciences. He died at the advanced age of 81, beloved by everyone who knew him. He was one of the first citizens of the city of Kalamazoo, and one of those men who in his short public service had made for himself a name not unworthy of the best traditions of the State of Michigan. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating a speech by my colleague, Hon. LOUIS LUDLOW, on public morals and citizenship, delivered at Martinsville, in my district.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, on the night of November 4 last, members of all of the churches of Martinsville, Ind., assembled at the Christian Church in that city to listen to Representative LOUIS LUDLOW, of Indianapolis, speak on the subject "The Spirit of the Master." Mr. LUDLOW sought in that address to give a layman's view of the Savior of Mankind and the influence of the Christ spirit in human relations and in it he embodied the thoughts and conclusions of a newspaper writer and observer of wide vision and long experience.

Rev. E. L. Day, pastor of the Martinsville Christian Church, presided at the meeting, and Mr. LUDLOW was introduced by James A. Stuart, a well-known journalist of Indianapolis, and former president of Sigma Delta Chi, the national newspaper fraternity. The address made by my colleague on that occasion was beautiful in thought and expression, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. LUDLOW spoke as follows:

THE SPIRIT OF THE MASTER—A LAYMAN'S IMPRESSION OF JESUS OF NAZARETH

When your beloved pastor invited me to speak to you to-night I had some misgivings as to whether I should be able to say anything that would be inspiring or appropriate to the occasion, and then it occurred to me that there might be something of interest in the observations of a veteran newspaper man who for nearly 40 years has been watching and recording the progress of events from the world's watch towers, as to the influence of the Savior in human relations. Some of you who have known me all of my life as a newspaper man may be trying to figure out in your own minds just how I am able to qualify as a speaker on religion, the aforesaid occupation being generally regarded as being somewhat remote from the meditations of the cloister. I will admit there may be a natural presumption that needs to be rebutted, but after all there is no one who comes into closer contact with human nature in all of its angles than the newspaper man, or whose eyes are better trained to observe in the never-ceasing drama of life the instances where divinity meets humanity and lifts it up and strengthens it.

A LAYMAN'S VIEWPOINT

And so to-night, amid surroundings that are hallowed by sacred memories of Christian service, with my heart meeting your hearts in a spirit of reverence that overflows even though it may not be articulate, I shall try, in so far as I have information and inspiration and descriptive ability, to present a layman's view of Jesus Christ and His work on earth, and my subject will be "The Spirit of the Master."

For the Savior we worship is a living Christ, whose spirit is forever active on land and on sea, in great cities as well as in the most remote fastnesses of the earth, wherever the human heart beats and poor, suffering mortals yearn for the many mansions of Paradise.

To undertake to describe the character of Jesus of Nazareth or to present in understandable form His personality and the motives that actuated Him in His earthly ministry is like trying to put on canvas the sweet incense of the flowers that recurrently, as the seasons come and go, cover with a blanket of beauty the hills of His native Palestine. No one has ever seen the face of God, and a description of Him is beyond the power of any living tongue or brain, and yet we know that God reigns and that His Son is the way and the truth and the life, the Savior who leads us day by day in paths of righteousness and who has ample room for all of the human race in His encircling arms.

Nineteen hundred years have elapsed since the unspeakable tragedy of the cross, but he who says that Christ is dead speaks as one wholly without knowledge and void of understanding. Jesus is the greatest influence in the world to-day. Thrilled by His example, countless millions in the ages since Calvary have gone forth to do good as they sing His praises and bless His name. There could be no more conclusive proof of His divine attributes. His spirit is a living force of never-ending blessedness in every theater of human activities. The agony of Gethsemane and the cross did not bring to Jesus death as we understand death. Oh, no! It set His spirit free to do the work of His Father for all time. Of Him it might have been said when He yielded up the ghost on Calvary as was said 18 centuries later of a Christlike man:

"He belongs to the ages now."

I like to imagine acts of goodness performed by the Master while He was yet on earth in addition to those recorded in Holy Writ. There must have been many such. But I like, above all, to think of the spirit of the Master as it finds expression every day in innumerable acts of mercy and the wide range of its never-ceasing ministry.

NO DEPTHS TOO LOW

One of the beauties of Christianity is that it is no close corporation. At its table is always spread a feast of love, and whosoever will may come. The human derelicts, the dregs of life, are welcome to the fountains of salvation if only they come with hearts that are pure and true.

For 1,900 years the spirit of the Master has been at work on earth. In innumerable instances and myriads of variations its wonders have been performed. It takes the meanest sinner, despised of everybody, and lifts him up until he becomes an instrument of righteousness, worthy of a kingly diadem. Its aim always is to be of service and there are no depths too low for it to penetrate in its processes of salvation. If we go out looking for the spirit of the Master, we are more likely to find it in hovels than in palaces. It will go anywhere and do anything to save and rehabilitate a soul, remembering, as the poet says, that—

"Every human heart is human;
"That in even savage bosoms there are yearnings, longings, strivings for the good they comprehend not."

Anybody who imagines that the Spirit of the Master is not an active force in these modern times will be undeceived if he analyzes events which have occurred within the memory of those now living.

Long before houses of worship dotted the hills and plains of Indiana, except a few log churches of the rudest description, the Spirit of the Master was very much alive in the camaraderie of the frontiers.

Hospitality measured by the Biblical yardstick "I was a stranger and ye took me in" was exemplified wherever in the vast reaches of wilderness a pioneer had erected his home and fireside. The latchstring was always hanging out, and the stranger at the gates found a cheery welcome and shelter, though he had never been seen before. When sickness came and the angel of death hovered over a cabin home the neighbors from far and wide, working in the forests and fields all day, would sit in relays by the patient's side and tenderly minister to his wants through the long vigils of the nights, and the kindness that was showered upon the stricken family beggared description. The spirit of the Master!

In the most crucial days of the Civil War Abraham Lincoln was called upon to exercise the power of life or death over many soldiers. Among them was a green country boy from the mid-west who had been taken from the farm without the slightest military preparation and had been assigned to sentry duty. For two days and nights he had no rest; and then, overcome by sheer exhaustion, he fell asleep at his post. His military chiefs were bitter in their condemnation of him. He was sentenced to be shot and the order was about to be executed when news of the poor boy's plight reached the ears of the President. He immediately issued a full pardon, saying as he did so:

"It is not to be wondered at that a boy, raised on a farm, probably in the habit of going to bed at dark, should fall asleep when required to watch and I can not consent to shoot him for such an act."

NEAREST TO HIS HEART

Later a great battle was fought at Fredericksburg. Among the slain found nearest to the Confederate lines was the body of a young man who had died bravely fighting for his country. Identifying marks proved that this soldier was the farmer boy who had been pardoned by Lincoln. When his outer clothing was removed a photograph was found nearest to his heart. It was a picture of the President, and beneath it in the soldier's handwriting were the words:

"God bless President Lincoln."

Lincoln, the immortal! Innumerable were the acts of Christlike mercy performed by that great, kind-hearted man as he groped his dark way to a martyr's grave.

Once a commanding officer came in from the field to Washington to see him. This general had with him warrants for the execution of 24 deserters to be signed by the President. Lincoln knew how to be firm.

"No, sir; I will not do it," he said.

"Mr. President," protested the officer, "unless examples are made of these men the Army is endangered. Mercy to the few is cruelty to the many."

There was a look of inexpressible sadness on President Lincoln's face as he replied:

"Mr. General, there are already too many broken-hearted widows in the United States. For God's sake, don't ask me to add to the number, for I won't do it."

The spirit of the Master!

LEE AND GRANT

For four long horrendous years two great armies had been at each other's throats while the country was rocked by civil war. In some sections of the Southland every other household had lain its precious human sacrifice on the altar of a lost cause. It was a land of aching hearts and abysmal grief. Its people were so tired and sorrow stricken they knew not where to turn or what to do. They were forced to surrender. Their gallant general met the great commander of the victorious hosts to discuss the terms of capitulation. General Lee was thinking of his poverty-stricken people, of their wasted homes, of the lack of horses to work the farms, since all of the animals had been commandeered for military purposes, and there was a heavy lump in his throat when he said to General Grant:

"General, where shall my men surrender their horses?"

General Grant's answer will live forever.

"Your men need not give up their horses," he said very kindly. "They may take them home. They will need them for the spring plowing."

The spirit of the Master!

Day by day, in little things and big, this wholesome healing influence is in operation. A boy named Bryan Untiedt, marooned with a group of children in a bus in a howling snowstorm in Colorado, takes command of the situation, wraps his own coat around another, and by his heroism and loving devotion saves the lives of many. Who can imagine a nobler illustration of the spirit of the Master? It seems to me that even Jesus must feel thrilled with pride when he thinks of Bryan Untiedt.

A nation is ground to the last hair's breadth of desperation to meet its obligations growing out of war. Its people are heartsick and weary. Our President says, mercifully:

"You may postpone further payments for one year until you are rested."

The spirit of the Master!

The nations all around the world are inexpressibly weary of war. They are weary of its heartaches, of its unspeakable terrors, weary of the pain it puts into the hearts of mothers. The two great English-speaking nations send their plenipotentiaries to a conference at London and there an agreement is reached on a reduction in naval armaments which makes more remote the possibility of future war. There is the spirit of the Master operating on a gigantic scale.

A member of the church where to-night we are gathered in His name learns of a family that is starving, the widowed mother ill, a baby in her arms, no work for the adult children, no food, no fuel. He invokes the aid of your splendid organization. Medical treatment is arranged for the mother, fuel is supplied, the hungry mouths are fed. The spirit of the Master! Nearly 2,000 years ago He said:

"For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in:

"Naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me.

"Verily, I say unto you, inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

"GOD BLESS OUR HOME"

A Congressman of the United States is asked to arbitrate the differences of an estranged couple. The husband, a veteran, went into the jaws of hell for his country and received injuries, for which he draws a large compensation. He has an irritable disposition, which his friends charitably attribute to the harrowing experiences of war. His wife, feeling herself unable longer to endure his vicarious temper, leaves him and pleads with the Congressman to arrange to have part of his pension paid to her. The veteran resists the demand and pleads with the Congressman to support his contention. The Congressman accepts the call to arbitrate, but performs the task in an unexpected way by writing a letter to each, recalling how husband and wife first met and how their affections for each other grew; how they were married, and then came the children one by one, playing on all their tender memories, and, finally, in the very last paragraph, winding up with the suggestion that that compensation check should never be split. His advice is accepted and the family reunited, and the most prominent decoration in their little cottage to-day is the motto, "God Bless Our Home." The spirit of the Master!

Oh, there is something for every one of us to do! Here is a girl whose widowed mother is too poor to provide her the clothing to enable her to appear like other little girls at school. She is slighted and neglected by her companions until her heart is almost broken. Make it your business to buy her a dress or a pair of shoes or a pretty ribbon occasionally. You will never miss the money, and you will make a little soul supremely happy. Yonder is a sick and disabled soldier with a future as black as midnight. When the call to duty came he offered everything he had, even life itself, on the altar of his country. He is entitled to relief but does not get it, because through lack of experience he can not establish the service origin of his disabilities. Offer your services and help him to perfect his claim by securing the necessary affidavits, and you will bring happiness to another soul. There is no end to the possibilities of service. But, you ask, how can we, mere infinitesimal units in the scheme of creation, become working partners of Christ in the great plan for the redemption of the world? Well, there is one thing we can do, all of us. We can help one another, and by so doing justify our existence and vindicate God's great purpose—the brotherhood of man. We should not wait for the call of distress to come to us but should anticipate it by seeking ways to serve.

OUT IN THE BYWAYS

The poor we have always with us. In the byways are the sick and hungry, and those who are starving for the spiritual things of life. Let us seek them out and help them, doing for them as best we can, nor ever counting the cost. Though we may be reduced to rags by this life of service and self-denial we will wear the livery of the King of Kings and will enjoy the highest privilege given to mortals—the privilege of helping others. If we go looking for opportunities to render loving service such as Christ would render, we will find them all around us. We can do nothing better, we can do nothing finer, we can do nothing grander than to help our fellow mortals over the rough places of life. That is what Jesus of Nazareth did; that is what all of the saints of all the ages have done; that, as I conceive it, is Christianity, and there is no more beautiful, no sweeter philosophy of life than is contained in the quaint old phrase:

"Do all the good you can, in all the ways you can, to all the people you can, just as long as you can."

We should above all strive to be practical in our service to our fellows. Beautiful and imposing as are the temples of our Lord, inspiring and uplifting as are the symphonies that fill the great cathedral aisles, a stately edifice and an impressive ceremony do not of themselves constitute religion. Real religion—the religion of the Master—is the performance of good acts. When we search out a distressed and despairing brother and give to him the means of sustenance and the encouragement that starts him with a new hope and a new outlook for better and brighter things, the encouragement that puts a song in his heart, we are exemplifying the best there is in religion. One act of loving kindness is worth more than any ceremony, although I do not mean by that to decry the necessity and importance of proper church services.

I plead for a religion that fits the everyday needs of humanity, for a religion that works continuously, for a religion that never sleeps. I have attended services at a church in another city where I spent most of my time, curiously wondering what the Master would say if he were there. Architecturally and in its interior arrangements the church is a dream. The sunlight filters in through magnificent memorial windows. The pipe organ would delight the soul of Mozart or of Wagner. Before one can get interested in the services his eyes must become accustomed to the glitter of diamonds and his ears to the rustle of silk skirts. When the doors close after the services on Sabbath night that church ceases to be a factor in the community until the next Sabbath, when the same scenes of grandeur are repeated.

That, in my opinion, is not the best type of church. The best church is one whose beneficent activities reach out into every walk of life, and touch the poorest of the poor, a church whose saving graces go on forever. We must remember that the speakeasies and the dens of vice never close. The agencies that pluck our brightest jewels—our children—in the morning of their lives and start them on the primrose path to hell work seven days and seven nights a week.

The church must meet this challenge. If we love the Master let us show the depth of our devotion by never-ceasing attention to the things He would have us do.

"Work, for the night is coming, when man's work is o'er!"

All of us, if we will, can become working partners of Jesus who, though dead, still lives. All of us, if we will, can be governed by the spirit of the Master. There is work always to be done in the dark recesses, the byways and the alcoves of the world, even transcending in importance the service in more open fields where the limelight plays. The true Christian is not a chooser. He accepts the task at hand and does it well.

We should make it a point to see how many acts of loving service we can perform every day, and a good way to decide upon the quality of a contemplated act, whether it is appropriate or permissible, is to ask ourselves the question:

"If Christ were here would I be willing to be found doing it in His presence?"

NEAR THE CROSS

And in all of our lives of service, until the end comes and we fall asleep, we would do well to keep in the foreground of our minds the sweetest and most majestic character of all the ages, whose life from the manger to the cross is a rainbow of hope for all of the human race. We need to think of Him to enrich our spirituality and to lead the way to the only life of real happiness, which is a life of service to others. There is in the city of Indianapolis, where I live, a wonderful painting of the Savior by Titian, owned by an Indianapolis man, which portrays with touching pathos the agony of the cross. In that picture the genius of the great artist has epitomized with a mastery that goes straight as an arrow to the human heart the sacrifices of the Son of Man for the remission of sins. I wish that every day of our lives all of us could see that picture for the memories it recalls, for the sense of duty it inspires. We need to be sobered and seasoned in ways of right living by a comprehension of the Savior's unfathomable love for us and the suffering endured by that great human God in order that you and I, and whosoever will, may find the way through service to eternal life.

"Near the cross, O Lamb of God,
Bring its scenes before me;
Help me walk from day to day
With its shadows o'er me."

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President:

[For President's message see Senate proceedings of this day, p. 297.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, the message of the President deals with such a variety of subjects it is impossible for me to offer the usual resolution dividing the message and referring it to the committees that would have jurisdiction of the subjects, but the message ought to be printed, and therefore for the present I am going to move to refer it to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and at a later date, when it can be carefully read and we can find out what committees it ought to be referred to, I shall then move that it be referred to the appropriate committees. For the present I move that the message of the President just read be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does it not suggest itself to the gentleman that at least it should be immediately referred to the Ways and Means Committee to take up the matter of the moratorium?

Mr. RAINEY. I think perhaps the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. SNELL. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] is a good one.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think the remainder of the message should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will pardon a suggestion by the Chair, under the rules of the House each committee can consider the various subjects within their jurisdiction without having the message referred to it. This has been the custom for the last 30 years.

Mr. SNELL. For that reason I thought the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois was the proper one at this time.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the motion of the gentleman from Illinois is agreed to.

There was no objection.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the President's message.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the President's message, with Mr. LOZIER in the chair.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, as I predicted some time ago, one of the hardest battles in this Congress will likely be over proposed moratoriums, reductions, settlements, or cancellations of the foreign debts to the United States.

The words "moratoriums," "reductions," "cancellations," all mean the same thing. They merely express different degrees or different steps of a scheme concocted by a group of international bankers to induce Congress to cancel the foreign debts to the United States and to unload them onto the American people, thereby enabling those financiers to collect their private loans abroad.

Of course, these debts can not be canceled. They can not be reduced. They can only be transferred to the backs of the American taxpayers. Every dollar taken off these debts must be paid by us. Every time a Congressman votes to cancel one dollar of these foreign debts he thereby votes to place that amount of extra burden upon the American people.

We have all the burdens we can bear now without assuming any more of the debts of Europe. Every Congressman might as well understand in the beginning that he is face to face with this problem and the American people are going to want to know where we stand, whether we are on the side of the American people or on the side of the international bankers.

As I have said before, fortunately this matter has to come to the House of Representatives—being a revenue measure, it must originate in this body.

So long as we have a deficit in our own Treasury; so long as we have 6,000,000 unemployed men in this country begging for work; so long as we have millions of women and children suffering for want of the necessities of life; so long as our farmers are forced to sell their crops below the cost of production; so long as our ex-service men, who fought the war out of which these international financiers made their fortunes, are denied payment of the balance of their adjusted-service certificates; so long as the widows and orphans of those men who have passed away are denied relief during these piping times of "prosperity"; so long as the property owners of America are having their lands and their homes taxed from under them in order to meet the burden of public improvements, as well as local current expenses; so long as these and other similar conditions prevail in our own country, Members of Congress can not justify a vote to cancel or postpone the collection of one dollar of these foreign debts when by doing so they would place this additional burden upon the already overburdened taxpayers of America.

For my part, I expect to fight every movement that even tends toward cancellation of another dollar of these foreign debts to the United States. [Applause.]

It has been understood for 10 years that these foreign debts should have no relation to reparations, but now they bring in the reparations, and if the international bankers who are behind this movement have their way we will cancel every dollar of the foreign debts to the United States, and then we will be paying the reparations instead of their being paid by the losing powers in the World War.

We might as well use plain language now and understand this thing as we go along.

Why, you would think from a reading of this message that this condition had brought on a world depression and was the cause of the panic in which we find ourselves today. I will tell you what caused the panic. This panic has been brought about as a result of legislation passed by your administration since 1921 by which you have attempted to distort the laws of economics, set aside the laws of supply, and enrich the favored few at the expense of the great masses of the American people.

In 1921 you came into power by the greatest majority you had ever had up to that time. You have been in power ever since, up to the convening of this Congress.

It has all been one administration—some fellow said the other day that Mr. Mellon had served under three Presidents, and one man wisely asked if three Presidents had not served under Mr. Mellon.

You have had full sway for 10 years, and what do we find? We find now that the first thing you did was to place upon the statute books of this Republic the highest protective tariff law ever known in a civilized country in times of peace, taking it as a whole; a law that levied a tax upon everything the American people buy, from the swaddling clothes of infancy to the lining of the coffin in which old age is laid away. You did this in order to benefit those special interests that have grown rich, and fabulously rich, as a result of this distortion of the powers and functions of government.

What was the result? You soon bled agriculture white. You soon found that the people of the agricultural States of the South and West and of the North and the East were becoming bankrupt. Some of your leaders referred to the representatives from the agricultural States as the "sons of wild jackasses" merely because they had the courage, both here and in another body, to protest against the carrying out of a policy that had driven their people, and was rapidly driving those States, into bankruptcy.

In 1928, when you had stimulated certain phases of industry beyond its natural bounds, when you saw the bubble was going to burst, you told the American people that we were just in the edge of prosperity. You did not tell them which edge. You said that this "superman," this "high-powered intellect," who was at that time Secretary of Commerce, had developed, or discovered, foreign markets for everything that America could produce, and that we were just in the dawning of the greatest era of prosperity the world had ever seen.

You published those statements, you radioed them, you broadcast them. You preached them in every schoolhouse in the country where you could get an audience. Of all men on earth who knew, or should have known, that those statements were untrue it was the then Secretary of Commerce, who is now President of the United States. He was familiar with world conditions, he knew that there was a limit to the foreign markets for materials produced by the American people and American industry.

What was the result? There were thousands of men called "white-collar men"—lawyers, doctors, bankers, clerks, and so forth—who had saved a little money, and they were induced by that propaganda to invest that money in stocks. Certain large corporations had been paying stock dividends, even watering their stocks. They began to unload. These innocent victims began to buy on your promise of unsurpassed and unlimited prosperity. As soon as the election was over and these victims found they had been deceived they rushed into the market with their stocks and attempted to unload, and then the greatest crash ever known in history occurred.

These policies which you have written into your platform have borne the bitter fruit of one of the greatest panics the world has ever seen.

This is not due to any conditions in Germany; it is not due to any conditions in France; it is not due to any quarrel between Italy and France. It is due to the legislation that you have passed here, which has almost wrecked the very economic structure of America.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. For a question.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman designate the legislation to which he refers?

Mr. RANKIN. I just designated some of it—the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill of 1921 for one, and the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill of 1930 for another. I am now mentioning some that we are going to try to keep you from passing, and that is reductions or cancellations of these debts that are in the background of this message.

You have not only gone to the point of destroying the toiling masses of America economically but you have driven every other country in the world into retaliating, until to-day the map of the civilized world is a barbed-wire entanglement of tariff barriers, behind which world trade has become stagnant and world commerce has become paralyzed. If we are to do something to relieve this deplorable condition, why do we not get a message asking you to join us in reopening the channels of trade with the various nations of the earth?

Some of you want to know why I oppose this moratorium now. I opposed this movement in June. I am not responsible for what a few men told the President at that time. If the President of the United States wanted this measure put through he should have called Congress in session. Besides, at that time there was supposed to be no connection between moratoriums and reparations. I think if you will read what has been said by those emissaries who have been here in connection with this subject you will find that they are now interweaving them with the question of reparations. If that is true, then those Senators and Representatives are not bound to support such a movement. The President is now asking you to reestablish the old debt-funding commission, whose activities, in my humble opinion, cost the American taxpayers $8,000,000,000. We do not need a debt-settlement commission. Remembering our bitter experiences of the past, I shall certainly oppose recreating this commission.

If the President wanted this question taken up, he should have called Congress into session in June, when the American people wanted it called into session. If he had, we might have done something toward relieving unemployment, we might not have had these six or eight million men out of work, we might have mitigated this horrible panic. But since he has waited and brought it in here now, I am in favor of considering it as an entirely new matter. We are not going to be rushed hastily into action either, and you are not going to get it passed by the 15th of December, if you get it passed at all, which I seriously doubt.

Yesterday I heard gentlemen on the Republican side of the aisle trying to leave the impression that we on the Democratic side are in favor of a "dole," and one gentleman very emphatically said that the Republican side of the House was not in favor of a "dole." A dole for whom? I am not in favor of a dole. But I am not willing to see men, women, and children starve. You are about to be asked to vote for a dole. Are you willing to give a dole to these international bankers?

Mr. REED of New York. No.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. No.

Mr. RANKIN. All right. Then you are not in favor of these moratoriums or debt cancellations or reductions. I was as much surprised at the argument of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] yesterday as some were at his attitude. He intimated that we Democrats are in favor of a "dole." In 1930, when we were on the brink of this great catastrophe, the gentleman from Maine and those on his side of the House, except the progressives, whom your leaders have designated as "sons of the wild jackass," the majority of you, voted for the passage of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, which was a "dole" to the great predatory interests that had already grown fabulously rich at the expense of the American people.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Are you in favor of the dole for the international bankers?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. No.

Mr. RANKIN. Ask your question.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Just a question. Would the gentleman be willing to put into the RECORD at this time those rates in the tariff bill to which he objects?

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, read the bill.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Then the gentleman is opposed to the whole bill?

Mr. RANKIN. The Fordney-McCumber tariff bill, yes; and also this Smoot-Hawley monstrosity.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Then the gentleman is opposed to all of the increases in agricultural rates?

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, let the gentleman——

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I am asking the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. I do not yield further. Now, I understand the gentleman from Kansas. He represents the poor wheat farmers; that is, he represents some of them. I want to talk to him about his wheat growers in a minute.

They talk about a "dole" now.

In 1921, the day you voted for the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill, there were 21 individuals in the United States with incomes of a million dollars a year. In 1928, the last date for which we have been able to get definite figures, that number had grown to 511. It had multiplied twenty-five times. While the wheat growers of Kansas and the cotton growers of the South and the corn growers of the West, and all other farmers, had grown poorer, these individuals with incomes of a million dollars each had increased from 21 in 1921 to 511 in 1928.

In 1921 Mr. STRONG, the day you voted for the Fordney-McCumber bill, the day your party passed it, there were 63 people in the United States with incomes of between $500,000 and $1,000,000 a year.

In 1928 that number had grown to 983. They had grown richer. They had multiplied ten times, and at the end of that time when those of enormous fortunes had grown richer and multiplied their incomes from ten to twenty-five times you came in here and voted for this last tariff bill that gave them a further "dole" and levied a further tribute upon the toiling masses of the American people, including the people of Kansas, whom the gentleman [Mr. STRONG] so fondly represents.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. No. I want to talk to the gentleman about his wheat growers. Whenever you get on the nerves of any of them they get up and talk about the tariff on agricultural products. I want to talk about that a minute. Did you know that they led these farmers up on the hilltop and these men representing the agricultural districts to believe they were doing something for them by saying "We will write into the bill 42 cents tariff on wheat"? It was already 42 cents then, but the gentleman from Kansas fell for that. His party fell for it. Let us see what the result is to-day. You are selling wheat in Kansas to-day for less than 30 cents a bushel.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. No; we are not.

Mr. RANKIN. All right. I will leave it to the other gentlemen from Kansas. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] is satisfied with the price on wheat in Kansas under this tariff?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. No; I am not.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] knows that wheat in Kansas is not bringing the amount of the tariff of 42 cents.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That is right.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] had the right to write a tariff bill, where would the gentleman place the tariff on wheat? At what amount?

Mr. RANKIN. Now, that is a wise (?) question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am assuming that the gentleman knows something about the tariff. If the gentleman had authority to fix the tariff on wheat, at what figure would the gentleman put it?

Mr. RANKIN. There is no need putting an "if" on it. While I may not write it, my party is going to write it next year; but it does not make any difference about the tariff on wheat now. You have ruined the wheat farmer already.

Mr. SIMMONS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RANKIN. I will answer the gentleman's question. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] voted for that tariff bill, and the sop they got out of it in Nebraska was that it would raise the price of wheat when there was already a 42-cent tariff on wheat at that time, but, wheat was then 10 cents a bushel higher in Canada than it was in the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The question is clear. If the gentleman had authority to write a tariff bill, at what figure would he place the tariff on wheat?

Mr. RANKIN. I am in favor of reducing the whole schedule.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. On wheat?

Mr. RANKIN. On everything that now bears a tariff until we get it down to where it will restore the trade of the world.

Mr. SIMMONS. That does not answer my question.

Mr. RANKIN. That answers it.

Mr. SIMMONS. In other words, the gentleman admits that he does not know what he would do?

Mr. RANKIN. No. The gentleman from Nebraska admits he does not know what he has done. I refuse to yield further.

I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. My friend said he would lower tariff schedules until we established stable business conditions throughout the world. Does the gentleman mean by that that the United States has lost its foreign export since the last tariff bill was passed?

Mr. RANKIN. Of course, a great deal of it.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. How much?

Mr. RANKIN. Well, I have not measured it, but it is enormous.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If the gentleman will get the facts, he will find——

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Ohio contends that we have not lost our foreign exports?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I asked the gentleman from Mississippi if he contends that we have.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is a Member of the House.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes. I do contend that we have not lost our foreign exports.

Mr. RANKIN. Since the gentleman is happy in that delusion, I am going to dismiss him and proceed with the discussion of wheat.

Now, I will say to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS], and the other Members from the wheat-growing States, that not only was wheat higher in Canada than in the United States before this bill was passed but this bill has provoked foreign countries into placing an additional tariff against you. One man who is well informed and who now dwells in a foreign country says it has done more than that. He said: "The country in which I live now requires an importer's license. They require an importer's permit from a board that is under no compulsion. They can grant it if they want to, or they can deny it if they want to. Then when it comes in he must pay the importer's tax; it has to be mixed with native wheat, one-quarter foreign wheat and three-quarters native wheat, and they must go through all kinds of inspections which makes it cost so much that it is more trouble and expense than it is worth to bring it in."

He says this American tariff has provoked the people of Europe to the passage of laws and regulations against products from this country, and that if the matter is not straightened out, we are going to find that in a very short time we will not be able to ship anything to Europe that can be made or produced in any of those countries, in any of their possessions, or in any of the countries with which they have open and reasonable trade relations.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman says the American tariff has provoked retaliation on the part of European countries in that they have placed higher rates upon wheat that is imported into those countries.

Mr. RANKIN. Not only on wheat but on other things.

Mr. HOPE. Is it not a fact that those rates apply also to wheat imported from any country just the same as from the United States?

Mr. RANKIN. Does that help the farmers of Kansas any?

Mr. HOPE. I am asking the gentleman if that is not a fact?

Mr. RANKIN. Does that help the farmers of Kansas?

Mr. HOPE. Does the gentleman say that these countries have raised their tariff barriers against the entire world because we have passed a tariff bill in the United States?

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman ought to know that we have lost our South American trade. Right across the line in Mexico they have placed retaliatory duties on our agricultural commodities and those duties have done us more harm than your tariff has done the farmers good. The same thing applies to Canada. Our shipments to Canada have been greatly reduced, as the gentleman ought to know.

Now, gentlemen, you talk about a "dole." Every man who voted for those tariff bills voted to give a dole to those men who were already enormously rich, as was shown by the record of the Treasury Department. When they found they had destroyed their markets at home and abroad, what did they do? They shut their factories down and turned their workers out into the streets, yet when the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], or any other Democrat, advocates doing something for their relief, you call it a "dole." You are willing to give a "dole" to the predatory interests. You are willing to give a "dole" to the lords of industry. You are willing to give a "dole" to those men who do not need it—and give it at the expense of the great masses of the American people. But when we come here, in the midst of this terrible panic, and attempt to bring about the passage of any legislation that will help feed the hungry millions of America, you accuse us of standing for a "dole."

Not only that, but two years ago you came in here with a bill to refund income taxes for the year before. You voted for it. You said it would amount to $160,000,000, but I am pretty reliably informed that it finally amounted to more than $225,000,000. Was not that a "dole"? It had been passed on to the ultimate consumers. The masses of the people had paid in profits. They could not get it back. You passed that bill, over my protest, and gave a "dole" to those men who admittedly were in the most prosperous condition they had been in for years.

Some of you seem anxious for us to do something. We are going to do something.

We are working out a program. We did not know until within the last few days whether or not we were going to organize the House, but we will work out a program, and it is going to take into consideration not only the business of the country but the great mass of the American people whom you have reduced to poverty by your short-sighted pandering to the predatory interests of America.

I hear the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] say "Hurrah." That is in keeping with his usual argument. I would like to know what he is going to do to relieve the suffering people in Milwaukee.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Certainly.

Mr. SCHAFER. Modify the prohibition law and put about 25,000 people to work in that city and bring about prosperity. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANKIN. That is about as I expected. He wants to give them beer instead of bread. That is his idea of relief. But while your men are drinking beer, do you not think the women and children ought to have something to eat? Do you not think that in that cold, ungentle climate, with the thermometer below zero and the wind sweeping down in a terrific gale, that those women and children should have some shoes and clothes to wear and that those people generally should have some relief from this Republican prosperity? [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I want to get my own mind straight on this dole about which the gentleman is talking. The gentleman says we are giving a dole to the manufacturer.

Mr. RANKIN. I said you did give it to him.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Does that go to the manufacturer or does it really go to the man who is working in the factory?

Mr. RANKIN. I just told the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I am asking for information, nothing else.

Mr. RANKIN. I just told the gentleman that many of them had closed down their factories and turned their men out into the streets.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Let us take one that has not closed down, where they have a duty on the article they are making and they are keeping their men at work. If they give a dole to such a manufacturer, does it not revert back to the men who are doing the work?

Mr. RANKIN. The answer is no.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. It does not?

Mr. RANKIN. It does not.

If the President wants us to go along with him, let him come in with a message to reduce this tariff and reestablish world trade and bring prosperity to our people.

We Democrats are charged with responsibility. We expect to meet that responsibility. We are united. There is no dissension in our ranks. We are together, and with a united front we expect to move forward and to undo some of the things you have done to the American people during the past 10 years.

Henry Thomas Buckle, in his History of Civilization in England, states that the great reforms of the English-speaking race had consisted not in doing something new but in undoing something old. One of our greatest problems now is to undo some of the evils your party has wrought, restore prosperity, and give to the American people a new administration of equal and exact justice to all and special privilege to none. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, on yesterday it was very vociferously declared by two or three of the gentlemen on the Democratic side that they proposed to give us a program, the carrying out of which would restore prosperity and bring us back again to happy days.

Much has been said with reference to the decline of stocks. You would naturally have supposed with such a declaration coming from the majority party here that stocks this morning would at least look up a little; that it would have at least encouraged hope and given a ray of sunshine for the future. Instead of that, what do we see? The morning papers, every one of them, disclose the fact that stocks reached the lowest point yesterday they have reached in all times. If a mere threat on the part of the Democrats to initiate a program has this effect upon stocks, in the name of God what will their carrying out of it do? [Applause.]

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. At the very same time the American public was reading the President's message. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; but this was all offset by the fact they had heard declarations here from every side that the President's program would not be adopted; that you were going to substitute for it a program of your own, and by realizing that you have the majority here whereby you can disregard the President's recommendations.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The stock market yesterday closed at just about the time the oratory began here. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I expect they anticipated it and closed a little early. [Laughter and applause.] These stock fellows have a wonderful power of divining things.

Gentlemen, I was a little surprised to hear the gentleman who has just left the floor, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], say that the legislation with reference to the moratorium would not be passed by the 15th, if passed at all, and that he has very serious doubt as to whether it will ever pass. Is this the character of support that the Democratic side is going to give the administration for the purpose of relieving the economic condition of this country? Is this the progress you are going to make toward getting us back again upon the road to prosperity? Before the President ever announced to the world his plan with reference to this moratorium, he did what he should have done, and the plan was concurred in, as it should have been concurred in, by a vast majority of the Democrats on this side, and a vast majority of the Democrats on the Senate side.

Now then, are you going to keep the faith? Are you going to act in good faith? Were you in earnest when you said it would be a good thing for the country? Do you propose to turn turtle on the proposition now? Are you going to prolong the distress in this country by reason of your inaction? You promised the world that you would give us action, and yet we are told that the thing that must be considered first if it is to be of any avail, will not be done within the time that it should be and that it is doubtful whether it will be done at all.

Let us see about this moratorium. The gentleman who just left the floor said it was done solely for the purpose of helping Germany. That is not true. It was not done for the sole purpose of helping Germany. That was the remote purpose. You talk about not getting pay from foreign countries. The one prime purpose of the moratorium was to make it possible to get our pay from the Allies. We all know that our debtor nations depend on the payments by Germany to these other countries. If the economic system of Germany had broken down so that they could not pay what they owe, in turn those who owe us would have the same excuse for not paying us.

I was in Germany directly after the war and I saw the German mark go down, down, down until it was a worthless scrap of paper. That same thing might have happened if the moratorium had not been granted.

It was announced through the press that Germany could not longer meet the increased payments and something had to be done. If that is true, if Germany should become bankrupt and unable to pay her debts to the Allies, they in turn would have the finest excuse for not paying us. The thing for us to do, the thing the whole business world wants, is to encourage Germany so that she can meet her obligations in turn and that the other countries can meet their obligations to us.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MAY. If the discussion of the proposition of the President to defer the payment by Germany for reparations affected the stock market in America, will the gentleman explain to the House why it took President Hindenberg and the entire cabinet weeks to prevent a collapse of the financial situation in the Republic of Germany?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, that has nothing to do with it. Germany has her troubles, as we have our troubles. The gentleman from Mississippi lays the whole thing on the tariff.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. In the first place the gentleman does not quote me correctly. I want to ask him, if granting a moratorium is going to restore prosperity, why is it that we have not had prosperity since last July, when the moratorium was first promulgated?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman has answered his own question. It is because of the doubt and uncertainty that Congress would ratify the moratorium. The public was looking for just such gentlemen as the gentleman from Mississippi to oppose it.

Mr. RANKIN. I never said that I was going to vote for the moratorium. I said at the time I was opposed to it and I have continued to be opposed to it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Perhaps that is so. I do not know whether the gentleman promised Al Smith that he would vote for a protective tariff or not.

Mr. RANKIN. I did not.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. But a great many of your people did. It was very popular at that time, so popular even that Mr. Smith sent out a request to every Democratic Member of the House and to every Democratic Member of the Senate asking them, imploring them, in order to save the ship from sinking to pledge themselves to vote for a protective tariff, and they came to his relief in great numbers and signed it. Yet we see no evidence of the carrying out of that pledge. On the contrary, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] said that he would reduce all the schedules. He also cited the fact that by reason of this tariff, wheat in Kansas to-day is selling for less than the amount of the tariff. If that be true, I expect that if we took all of the tariff off and permitted the dumping of Russian and Argentine wheat and wheat from all the rest of the world into this country, it would increase the price of wheat in Kansas.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. I understand that these payments from Germany are about $400,000,000 annually?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. About that.

Mr. PARSONS. And that that amount is to be loaned back to the German people, and that interest will be paid to the amount of $14,000,000 annually. Instead of Germany owing $400,000,000 she will owe $400,000,000, plus one-tenth of this annual payment, or $40,000,000, plus $14,000,000 in interest, or $454,000,000. If Germany can not pay $400,000,000 this year, how will she pay $450,000,000 next year and the next year and the next year and so on?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is a problem, but in answer to the gentleman, carrying on that same sort of logic, permit me to say we have a deficit in this country of about $2,000,000,000. It may be greater than that. Are we to say, because of the fact that we have that deficit now, that in the future we may not be able to clear it up entirely and get our country again on even keel? You gentlemen are looking into despair all of the time; you can not see any relief except in gloom. If we are to carry out a program of that character, of course, what you say would be true.

On the other hand, if the economic conditions of the world can be settled, if there can be a readjustment to meet these changed conditions that have come by reason of the war, ought we not to travel toward that end? Never in all time has there been a war where there was not also inflation, and there has never been a time as the cessation of a war when there has not been deflation. Deflation was kept off longer this time than at the close of any previous war, but finally it came. In every other instance it has taken a long time for us to readjust ourselves. I am not as old as Methuselah, yet we have gone through two or three depressions in my time. As a boy I remember that after the Civil War the depression lasted for seven or eight years. Prices were high and wages very low, and there was real suffering in this country. Starvation did exist then in the country. Thanks be to God nobody has starved in this country yet, and I do not believe anybody will starve in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman was in this Chamber on May 3, 1917, when Premier Viviani and his French high commission were on that rostrum, and through the shedding of tears and the kissing of cheeks they promised this country that they would pay back the money that was loaned them. Does the gentleman mean the people of the United States to understand that the payment by France and our other Allies of the debt they owe us is dependent upon the reparations that Germany pays them?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Not altogether.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No. Not altogether.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a national debt that those countries owe.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Not altogether, no; but it affords them a splendid excuse for not paying. I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that of all the ingratitude that was ever paid by one nation to another, none equals that which has been paid to this country by France.

Mr. RANKIN. France did not ask for this moratorium; it did not come from France; it came from the international bankers.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, the gentleman goes wild about the international bankers. It occurs to me that instead of decrying the rich, instead of discouraging the sources from which money may be expected to come to put the furnace fires going again and to make the wheels buzz in busy industry and give employment to men, we would better bend our efforts toward encouraging business enterprise, rather than be trying to keep money in the hole where these depressed conditions have driven it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman, by what he has already said, seems to indicate that it is in the nature of a duty on the part of the Democratic Party under the existing circumstances to follow the recommendations of the President as to the moratorium. The gentleman seems to assume the attitude in advance that the Democratic Party will oppose the President's proposition. So far as I am informed, no such conclusion has been reached.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman from Mississippi, who assumes to speak for the gentleman's side, has said already that he will not vote for it, and that he never promised to, and that the legislation necessary may not pass at all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That may be the individual view. I do not know what the individual views will be after we have conferred about this proposition, but the question I wanted to ask the gentleman is this: Following up the suggestion of the gentleman that the Democrats should support the President's proposition and that we should do so, and that is followed by a proposition I think is fairly prophesied to-day, of the President having to suggest a cancellation or material reduction of existing foreign debts, will the gentleman and his party ask us to go along with him in that respect?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The President has not advocated the cancellation of the debt, and, as far as I am individually concerned, I will never vote for the cancellation of a dollar of it. [Applause.] The fact of the matter is we have been too liberal with these nations already.

Mr. RANKIN. Who has?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The Democrats loaned the money.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We did not get anything for our help. We did not ask anything. All we are getting to-day are curses and payments in checks of ingratitude.

Now, while listening to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] I was surprised to hear him say that it was the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill that was the incipient cause of this crash; that it destroyed our export trade. In the discussions of the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill on this floor I heard gentleman after gentleman on the Democratic side get up and say that if this iniquitous tariff bill became law it would absolutely destroy our exportations and our importations. At that time the revenue derived from tariff duties upon imports into this country was about $300,000,000 a year. In less than a year the revenues derived from importations into this country amounted to more than $600,000,000 a year—more than double. Likewise the exports more than doubled, showing, if you please, that the fallacious argument then advanced did not prove true. Now you are saying that the present condition of exports and imports of this country is caused by reason of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill. It has nothing in the world to do with it. I say to you gentlemen on this side that I can not believe that you will all subscribe to the proposition laid down by the gentleman from Mississippi that the tariff should be lowered upon all of these schedules for the purpose of bettering the conditions of America and Americans.

The gentleman from Mississippi specifically refers to what has been done by reason of the tariff against things raised in Mexico. I ask the people of Florida if they are going to subscribe to the proposition of taking the tariff off or materially reducing the tariff on vegetables that are raised in Florida? Next to fruit, the principal products of Florida are their vegetables. Gentlemen from Florida were here within the last few weeks before the United States Tariff Commission asking that the tariff be increased for the purpose of saving them from the ruinous competition of Mexico.

The gentleman from Mississippi is a free trader, pure and simple; he would join those who would tear down every customhouse in this country and permit everything to come here free and go out free.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman has no foundation upon which to base that statement. I said I was in favor of reducing the tariff to a point where it would restore world trade and prosperity, and I would equalize it throughout the country; but I have never entirely gotten away from the fundamental policy of a tariff for revenue only.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is just another name for a free trader. But a great many of your people profess to have gotten away from it. I wonder how Mr. John J. Raskob and Mr. Al Smith, in their next campaign, will talk with reference to this thing. They proclaimed in the last campaign that they were just as good and strong protectionists as any Republican.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. PURNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] five additional minutes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] now says he would have this tariff reduced for the purpose of restoring equilibrium between all the people of all the earth. That is a beautiful dream. If all the people of the earth had the same ideals, if all the people of the earth were raised under the same advantageous conditions, if all the people of the earth had the same ambitions as those who are born and raised under the Stars and Stripes—to rise to a higher plane than that of serfdom—then I would like to see his ideal consummated; but, unfortunately, that is not the case. The gentleman says he would lower the tariff for the purpose of bettering America and Americans. Does the gentleman think that by lowering the tariff he could better the conditions of our millions of workmen? One of the very purposes of the protective tariff is to take care of American laboring men, and it is of more benefit to American laboring men than to anybody else in this world. Yet, for a long time workmen were deluded by the sophistry coming from the Democratic platforms and speeches that they were being ruined by the protective tariff. The scales have fallen from their eyes, and I say to you gentlemen that you need not think longer that you can get the support of the workingmen of this country by tearing down the tariff walls which protect the workmen against the slave labor of South America and against the equal slave labor of continental Europe.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The doctrine which I have heard the distinguished gentleman from Indiana preach for the last 15 years is that the occupant of the White House should attend to his executive business and let the Congress of the United States attend to its legislative business. What does the gentleman say about his old doctrine?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I am still in favor of that. [Applause.] I think the President of the United States has well attended to his business. [Applause.] Under the Constitution it is the duty of the President of the United States, at the convening of each Congress, to either bring or send a message, advising as to the condition of the country and to make such suggestions as he thinks for the welfare of the country.

Mr. BLANTON. In vacation, however, what are his duties with respect to legislative matters?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. He has not anything to do with legislation when there is no legislative body to legislate.

The people of this country have had many afflictions, but they might have had many more if we had had an extra session of Congress. They might have had more if we had been here wrangling throughout the summer as we are here wrangling now, instead of trying to do something to better existing conditions. Gentlemen, it is time for us to get to work if we are here really trying to represent and help our people. Irrespective of party lines we should stand together as we stood together during the war. If we are not in accord with the things which the President suggests, let us suggest something else.

I am quite sure there is no one in this world who would be happier than Herbert Hoover if, perchance, you gentlemen could evolve and give to the world something that will relieve this distress. He would sign such a measure with celerity and be most thankful that a way had been found out of our distress. Now, gentlemen, that is our mission here. That is the duty we should perform, and especially is that the duty of the Democratic side, who will be charged with the responsibility for this performance of duty. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLIVER]. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues in the House, of course I was interested in the address of the gentleman from Indiana. I was inspired by it. He said that as soon as the Democrats announced that they would have a program the stock market went down. Let me tell him that every time in the last two years a Republican Cabinet officer predicted that prosperity was around the corner the stock market went down. [Applause.] When Andy Mellon would say that happy days are here again, down would go the stock market. Doctor Klein, of the Department of Commerce, was often heard to say, "Good times are right around the corner. The Republican Party will bring them right over." Every time he spoke the stock market went down. When Herbert Hoover came before the American people to tell them what benefits were about to flow from the Republican Party, down would go the market with a crash. The bears cheered whenever a prominent Republican spoke. And now that we have received two of the President's messages the market has fallen so low that the stocks will soon be off the boards with no bidders. The slump in the market did not follow the announcement of a Democratic policy, but it followed the logic of the devastating and destructive policies of the Republican Party for the last 10 years. [Applause.]

I missed something from the President's message. I wonder why he did not make some allusion to it. I missed the noble words of his speech of acceptance. I think I ought to call his attention to the fact that his message does not sound the same as his speech of acceptance. What did he say then?

> One of the oldest and perhaps the noblest of human aspirations has been the abolition of poverty. By poverty I mean the grinding by undernourishment, cold, and ignorance and fear of old age of those who have the will to work. We in America to-day are nearer to the final triumph over poverty than ever before in the history of any land. The poorhouse is vanishing from among us. We have not yet reached the goal, but given a chance to go forward with the policies of the last eight years we shall soon, with the help of God, be in sight of the day when poverty will be banished from this Nation. There is no guarantee against poverty equal to a job for every man. That is the primary purpose of the economic policies we advocate.

The abolition of poverty was the promise the President set out to redeem when he accepted the nomination. When you read his present message, all you find in it regarding the performance of that promise is a gruesome account of a disaster unprecedented in the history of the Nation which has befallen the country under Republican guidance.

He said in his acceptance speech:

> At one time we demanded for our workers a "full dinner pail." We have now gone far beyond that conception. To-day we demand larger comfort and greater participation in life and leisure.

He surely has given the workingman plenty of leisure. But he has not even a dinner pail, and he has not breakfast, dinner, or supper to put in a pail if he gets one.

I want to measure in words how that promise was kept. When Col. Arthur Woods was appointed by the President as director of unemployment last year, he stepped from the White House after a conference with the President and, when asked by the newspaper men what he thought of the condition of the country, he replied, "We are in a race with misery." Mr. Gibson, the present chairman of the unemployment committee in New York, the other day, up in my district, made a speech on the condition of the country, and said, "Oh, give, give quickly, lest the people starve." That measures the performance of the promise made by the President. His own message confesses his disastrous failure. He made that promise to the masses of the people to get their votes. He reached the heart of the American people when he made that promise. We all yearn to be safeguarded against poverty. Fear of poverty is one of the most destructive forces known to mankind. Therefore the lure of the President's promise had tremendous power. Every man wants a job. He wants promotion in due course and pay enough so that he may put something aside for old age. Those are the essential things in every man's plans and ambitions. And the President in seeking votes reached down into the hearts of the people and deluded them in their most cherished hopes by stating that he and the Republican Party would abolish poverty. That statement was the most demagogic ever uttered by a candidate for public office in America. He knew at the time he made it that he could not keep it. He sought votes; what difference did it make if to get them he deceived and deluded the people of the country? It got the votes.

Now the time has come when he sends a message to the Congress asking us to declare practically that a state of war exists and that his promises are broken and his pledges have collapsed. He says that the instrumentalities of government which were used during the war should be recreated that he may salvage something from the wreck of the broken promises and stupidities of the Republican Party. And the gentleman from Indiana talks of the stock market!

Oh, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] does not serve the cause of common sense very happily by alluding to the Democrats sneeringly.

I wondered why when he was making that speech he did not drag out that old sign they used to put up around the farms and in store windows all over the country, "Prosperity at home; prestige abroad—vote for the Republican ticket." And that more recent champion vote maker, "Good times with Hoover." In the next campaign we ought to make a sandwich sign with one of those mottoes on the front and one on the back and put it around the neck of the dear old gentleman from Indiana and send him through the country as a missionary for the Republican Party just to give the unemployed a laugh. That is all they can get out of life just now. The Republicans can not take away their sense of humor. They like the ridiculous. Let him go out with the old signs, "Prosperity at home—prestige abroad with the Republican Party." His dinner pail will not be full of votes when he comes back.

He can not delude the House. He talks about the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] opposing the moratorium and he charges that it proves that Democrats are not standing by the President. Why, the other day a great Senator from California, a Republican, coming across the continent, said he was going to pledge his life in the battle against the moratorium. The gentleman from Indiana ought to use some of his forensic eloquence to get the Republican Senator from California to stand by the President.

Is there unity on the Republican side on the moratorium? I have not heard of it. I know men on that side of the aisle who fear for their political lives if they support the moratorium. If the gentleman from Indiana has any speeches to make about standing by the President, let him try them out on the Republicans first and see how they go. Let us have an account of how they stand on the moratorium.

Oh, stand by the President, said the gentleman from Indiana, and so said the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] yesterday. Why have these Republicans any right to ask us to stand by President Hoover? Who are these teachers? What have they done for President Hoover that they would like us to copy? Did they stand by him when he vetoed the bonus? Why, they overrode his veto of the bonus with a cheer and an enthusiasm and a disloyalty that amazed the Democrats on this side. Did they stand by the President when the President asked them to support his veto of the bill to give decent hours to postal employees? Oh, no; they did not stand by the President then. They rode roughshod over him with a unanimity and alacrity that was astonishing for men who are now asking Democrats to pledge allegiance to the President.

And on the tariff! Why the gentleman from Indiana speaks of the tariff in the same speech in which he asks us to stand by the President. Let me read him what the President recommended about the tariff. On April 16, 1929, he said:

> I have called this special session of Congress to redeem two pledges given in the last election, farm relief and limited changes in the tariff.

Limited changes in the tariff!

That is what the President recommended. Now, let us see what these gentlemen who ask the Democratic Party to cooperate with the President did.

The tariff bill was started on its way by the Republican Members of the Ways and Means Committee. They held secret sessions, no doubt studying the President's message calling attention to the Republican pledge in the last election for a limited revision of the tariff. Out of the councils of the Republican members of the committee came the bill. Did they keep faith with the President? Did they keep faith with the Republican campaign pledge? No! The bill made an unlimited revision of the tariff, all rates up. All of the patriots who now claim they are supporting the President and who are now calling upon us to support him flouted both the President and their plighted word to the country. Then what happened?

The bill was under debate on the floor here for a week or so when it was suddenly taken off the floor and out of control of the House and was given over to a Republican caucus. They locked us out. They locked the press out. They locked the country out. Removed from the censorship of the people the caucus considered the bill secretly. The people were locked out and the bill and politics were locked in. It was there that orders were given that they carry out their promises to campaign contributors to lift the rates. The scientific tariff makers of the Republican Party wrote the sacred rates and their exact and equitable findings under the guidance of the competitive greed of the factions which they call a party. Then the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee were directed to write out the details of the bargain in the form of a bill for the people to pay. All of that time the President was sitting in the White House still proclaiming to himself that he wanted a limited revision of the tariff.

Oh, these gentlemen who want to teach loyalty to the President should look back a little bit into their own records to find out whether their action was loyal or not.

Why, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] in the course of the debate arose on the floor and in a brilliant and able speech pointed out a section of the bill which the President asked for and by which the President was given the taxing power which the Constitution gave to the Congress. The President wanted the power to raise and lower taxes without the bother of consulting Congress or facts. He yearned for a power which kings do not possess. And Mr. BECK in flaming tones called the President's attention to what Cromwell had done to Charles I. Although they were very dear friends, Cromwell cut Charlie's head off because he wanted the same power that the President asked for. It was the only way Cromwell could think of to discourage him. And Mr. BECK told the President on the floor of this House that the same thing that happened to Charles might happen to him. Oh, what harmony, what unity there was in the Republican ranks then!

Then the bill went over to the Senate for fattening. When it came back the provision giving the President monarchical authority was stricken out by loyal Republicans. Mr. BECK was saved the pain from which Cromwell suffered. Every single one of the Republicans in the end voted for that. They did not stand by the President. They deserted the President and deprived him of his fondest desire. They ran away from him. They defied and flouted the President. But the President's head was saved from Mr. BECK. They fled from him to save him.

His leadership was not a leadership they respected or feared. When they brought the bill to the White House, although two-thirds of the Republican papers, 1,000 economists, and an indignant nation called his attention to the plain and honest fact that his demand for a limited revision had been violated, that his sacred party pledge would be broken if he signed it, that trade would be made stagnant, that commerce would be destroyed, that hundreds of thousands would be unemployed if he signed the bill—he signed it with a flourish and an expression of gratitude to its authors.

When they laid it on his desk in the White House the forces of Mr. Grundy, with his campaign list, were evidently there. The President kept faith with the contributors and broke faith with the people. Oh, what a leader! They chained and bound the President of the United States and made him sign. Yet these very men are now asking us to stand by the President.

They never stood by the President. The President did not stand by himself. There never was any intention on their part to stand by the President. There is not a man who ran for office in the last campaign who said "I am going to stand by the President" that did not die in his tracks. You gentlemen are not going to stand by the President.

But he is a great engineer. Yes; one of the greatest in the world! Some one said in two and a half years he drained, ditched, and dammed America.

Stand by him until election day. I challenge the party of the opposition to stand by their President. Nothing will suit us better. The bravery of it will be inspiring.

The first plank in the new program of the Democratic majority will be, "Put the Republicans out." I do not know of any method of putting them out that could be more successful than to get you to stand by the President. [Applause.]

You have taken credit for the benefits of the blessings of the sunshine, and now you are going to take the blame for the evils of the moonshine you have been spreading around.

The Democratic Party is a united party. We fear no fight from the Republican side. We ask no quarter, and we will give no quarter. When your hypocritical plea is made to us by men who abandoned the leader of their own party—when the plea is made to us to stand in the place they so dread to stand in—it falls on deaf ears.

The Democratic Party will stand united behind its program. Now, Mr. Mellon comes in and asks for an increase in taxes to pay a deficit of $2,000,000,000. I wonder if the American people think that a Republican administration is worth that much money to them. Mr. Mellon wants to put 1,700,000 poor people back on the tax rolls. He seeks your help. It will give them a greater interest in government and in you. What did they gain when they put you in? What can they lose when they put you out?

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] is worried about the moratorium. He will support this one, but no more. He will not support any move to cancel the debts. But the President recommends the reestablishment of the Debt Funding Commission. Why does anyone worry about that? The President has consistently followed the policy of blaming the distress of America on Europe. He is going to follow the policy of helping Europe first because under his theory when Europe feels better the United States will cheer up. In his second administration he will do something for America. That is the policy of the President. [Applause.]

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], the newly elected floor leader of the Republicans, strode over the corpse of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] to the White House the day of his election and told the President that the Republican Party would never stand for the cancellation of debts, under any conditions. He acted in a true spirit of cooperation.

What other reason did he have? I will tell you why he did it. Because every newspaper in the country had reported that the President of the United States was going to help the European countries to transfer their war debts from the pocketbooks of their taxpayers to the pocketbooks of the American taxpayers. There is no question that that was and is the President's purpose.

Did Mr. SNELL stand by the President and try to help him out? He told him the Republican Party would never stand for that program. We all know Mr. SNELL. He was chairman of the Committee on Rules for years. When he tells somebody something, he just tells him. He means what he says. He speaks as a master, an able and direct man. We know that when he went to the White House and spoke to the President that he gave Mr. Hoover a chance to add another chapter to his autobiography entitled "Congressmen I have worked for."

He worked for Mr. HAWLEY on the tariff, and now he will work for Mr. SNELL. And he will give up his leadership to those who are plotting to ruin him politically as they did Mr. TILSON. Take that big table downstairs in the restaurant, where Mr. TILSON and Mr. SNELL broke bread for eight years. That is the plotters' table. That is where the conspirators meet. Gone is the laughter and happiness that hovered there! Now only whispers and scowls of disturbed souls. They will lay the political head of Mr. Hoover in the middle of that table pretty soon and toast it. These are the conspirators who want us to stand by the President. They ask us to give our allegiance to a cause which they have deserted. Down at the big table in the restaurant the plotters are at work.

Oh, stand by the President! Out from California comes a Senator—a giant, striding across the country—and I say this to prove the unity, the fraternity, the amity, the affection, the love, the heart-to-heart affinity within the Republican Party—this giant storms forth with a prayerful appeal to Mr. Hoover to do the Republican Party the greatest favor that could possibly be conferred on it by refusing to run again. He wants Mr. Hoover to cut off his own head. What unity! What harmony!

It sounded good to the ears of the plotters who secretly work to break the political career of Mr. Hoover. They remember that when Mr. Hughes ran for the Presidency he went to California and refused to meet the same Mr. JOHNSON. I recall that on election night in New York that the newspaper men went to his room at midnight and asked for an interview. The butler responded, "The President has retired." In the morning when the returns were counted Mr. JOHNSON and California had "retired" the President of the United States. This is the same Mr. JOHNSON. It is the same Mr. JOHNSON who ran as Vice President with Theodore Roosevelt on the Bull Moose ticket, when the Republican Party was driven into Utah and Vermont, the only States charitable enough to give it refuge. Quarantine signs were up everywhere else. This same great Republican wrathfully advises President Hoover that the greatest favor he can do to the Republican Party is to retire or face banishment to Utah or Vermont.

Yet you ask us to stand by the man doomed to the untimely political death prepared by you for Mr. Hoover. Oh, no, you stand by him. We challenge you to stand by him. You have never done it since his election and you won't do it now. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Democratic Party will not take its leadership from that side of the House. It is up to you to follow Mr. SNELL, the great progressive. He looked up his family tree lately and found out that he was "a son of a wild jackass." How progressive he became when the subject of the liberalization of the rules came up. Why did he favor it a week ago after opposing it for years? Just to kill off our good friend, your former able leader, Mr. TILSON. He did it just to play on the credulity temporarily and the votes of those poor fellows in your party who said that they would vote for a progressive and not a reactionary. Oh, poor Mr. TILSON! The political death and humiliation of that great and loyal friend of President Hoover is the most significant act of treachery on the Republican side in the beginning of their campaign of duplicity and hypocrisy in asking us to stand by the President. They will express their affection for the President in flowers, provided he accepts Senator JOHNSON's invitation to retire quietly in the interest of the public and the party.

The Democratic Party is not deluded by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD]. We are accepting no invitations to a party that is over. The greatest constructive service that can be rendered to the American people would be the obliteration of the Republican Party. That is constructive.

Mrs. KAHN. Destructive.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Oh, there is nothing left to destroy. You have been destroyed. You are down to fragments and figments of the imagination. We will follow our own course. We have our own leaders. I see four or five gentlemen over there whom I saw the other night at the Fox Theater. These loyal Hooverites, these men who are so devoted to the President, were there. The President's picture was shown on the screen. He made a fine speech, a very lovely speech, but these gentlemen did not applaud. Neither did anyone else. They sat there in silence, these men who love the President. The next picture was of Mussolini, and, oh, how they applauded him. I thought that their Republican hands would split. Then came a picture of Gandhi. They applauded him. They gave him an ovation. With an overhead of one pair of diapers he was stripped down to what the American business man will be stripped down to if the Republicans stay in power much longer. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] If we are to learn loyalty, we will never learn it from that side.

Mr. WOOD steps out as a missionary. I remember one time there was a great strike in Pennsylvania. There was a lawyer for the operators there. He was making a speech to the striking miners. He said, "We are all missionaries in the vineyard of the Lord." A little Irishman asked him, "Did you say you are a missionary?" "Yes," said the lawyer. The Irishman then replied, "I wish the Lord would make me a cannibal!" [Laughter.] When Mr. WOOD goes out as a missionary for the Republican Party he will find a great many cannibals in America if he will carry that old prosperity sign and ask votes for the Republican Party.

Every nation on earth has turned against us. "Prestige abroad!" With humanity yearning for friendship you struck a blow which put the world on guard. You extol your tariff. But remember the power to tax is the power to destroy. You lifted your tariff tax so high that you closed the doors of America to the commerce of the world. You put an embargo on the golden stream of trade. In retaliation in every capital of the world they have placed barriers against our trade. Trade which is the one source of wealth and prosperity has been strangled and made stagnant by your tariff. The explorers of old by valor and daring sought out routes of trade to enrich their countries and upbuild a world. You by your tariff have blocked the routes and impoverished a world.

Trade is the one thing that counts. Banks do not trade. They are only the vaults into which trade puts the riches it earns. Banks are only the servants and aids to trade. When you strangle trade you strangle banks. When you strangle trade you create unemployment. Banks do not employ the masses of the people. Trade employs them.

Why is it that hundreds of American factories are going to Canada, going to England, going over to Spain, to Germany, to Italy, and France? It is because capital can no longer employ American labor and still trade. It must leave these shores and employ foreign labor. The result of an embargo tariff and free trade is the same. Capital is driven to foreign shores, where it takes advantage of the cheap labor of other lands.

There is an old Roman expression, "Taxes are the cause of wars." Europe is warring against us now. American capitalists are closing their factories in the United States and squeezing their labor out into the streets. They are opening factories in Europe and swinging open the doors to let in the foreign labor of Europe. When the President signed the tariff bill he blew the whistle that put 7,000,000 men on the streets. Do not forget that! Work is over. Work is stopped. It can not go on again until the Democratic Party comes in and knocks the graft out of the tariff act.

You can not delude the people of the country. You went into caucus on the tariff and made rates to pay back your campaign contributions. They say that a campaign contribution to the Republican Party is like water to an old pump. The first pail of water you pour in to make it suck is the first water to come out when you work the handle.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. No. I am only yielding to the loyal friends of President Hoover. [Applause and laughter.]

Two thousand years ago a humble Man said, "The poor you will always have with you." In the last campaign a great modern statesman said, "We will abolish poverty forever from America by the beneficent policies of the Republican Party."

Now, you hear the footsteps of 7,000,000 men tramping on the rotten planks and broken promises of the Republican Party. They are back to the realities of 2,000 years ago when they were taught the first petition of the Lord's Prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread."

What has the President done for them? He recommends help for the banks, moratoriums for Europe, scaling down of war debts and a continuation of a strangulation tariff policy. How many men will this put back to work?

You want us to surrender to the Republican Party. No. We will not surrender. We are on the eve of one of the most tremendous victories that ever crowned a righteous cause. In 1932 this fight will be consummated by the election of a Democrat. [Applause.]

We are in no mood to dillydally with you. I violate no confidence when I say that the first step in our constructive program is to put the Republicans out. The second step is to keep them out. These are our first measures. I see the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. STEWART]. For nearly 20 years the Republicans had that district by a majority of 30,000. When this dignified statesman stood up before the people, with his high character, his wonderful integrity, and said the Republicans were without a leader, that they destroyed the country, the people believed him, and elevated him to the distinction that he will now honor as a Member of this House. [Applause.]

I see my friend from Texas. Read and shiver. Read and tremble. We are not going to surrender to the dead. Two Democrats ran against one Republican and each one of the Democrats beat him, and the best man won. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. From Michigan comes another. For 18 years that State was held by the Republican Party. Now they are buried so deep that there is no excavating machine that can find them. Read that and tremble. The high hat must come off, gentlemen. You can not wear it around here any more.

Where is that old slogan they used on the workingman the day before election, the one that the factory superintendents shouted in the yard. "If you vote the Democratic ticket, the factory will close and you will lose your job." That old fake is dead. That is killed. The factory is closed now. You can not play that any more on the people. "Good times with Hoover." What a slogan that was!

"Abolish poverty with Hoover." They worked once and are entitled to a second trial. We see the soup lines in the great cities of the country longer than ever in history, the poor more haggard and despondent than ever before, the poor whose welfare was to be guaranteed better than by an insurance policy through the beneficial program of the Republican Party. This administration has distinguished itself by bringing in an era of suicide and soup. That shall be its grand achievement in history.

Doctor Klein, of the Department of Commerce, the other day said in a tone of satisfaction, as if the Republicans had at last done the thing for which they were destined, "Business has reached the bottom." Reached the bottom? I do not know. You still have a year and a half to go, and we can not tell whether it has reached the bottom without knowing the depth of the pit you have dug for it.

The American people are aware of the contest. They want no surrender in the fight between plutocracy and the masses of the people. The delegation they have sent here does not intend to subscribe to the doctrine that the Government is here to make a few people rich and to grind the millions down. We will not subscribe to the doctrine that a few men shall own all that is worth owning and that the rest of us shall be mere trespassers in the land of our birth. The feudalism of great wealth and luxury which a few men own while the millions nibble the crusts that charity doles out to them and their children is your creation. It is the monument to yourselves which you have built up in the land of liberty and equality. You have created a surplus of greed and a surplus of need. The warfare is on. No quarter is asked. No quarter will be given. The fight between plutocracy and democracy is on. No plea for cooperation from the traitors to the President will be listened to with patience. When Mr. TILSON gets up on the floor, he who stood by the President, who died for him, and asks us to cooperate, we will know that his plea is sincere. But when it comes from the hypocrites who destroyed Mr. TILSON for that friendship, from the hypocrites who are plotting to eliminate the President from the contest, from the hypocrites who conspire to drag him from the place to which they so mistakenly elevated him, we will not listen to the plea for cooperation.

Our enmity is open and aboveboard. We are interested only in the American people. We will cooperate with them. We will cooperate with them in the restoration of the Government to an honest party in the interest of the masses of the people. We shall not make millionaires of a few and paupers of the many. We are going to fight a square fight. Our program will be announced. I say to you men who are about to die, Democracy challenges you, challenges you to stand up and fight. You seem to be trembling in your boots. You seem to have lost all of your assurance. You seem to have lost all of your courage, poor, defeated, divided souls. Cheer up. Remember "Good times with Hoover." We challenge you to fight by his side. When the die is cast you will find that you will need only one aisle over there for all the high hats that the Republican Party can send back to the Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the subject of my remarks to-day is A Poor Start. The first session of the Seventy-second Congress has indeed made a bad start. I want to submit to the membership of this House that ordinarily and under normal conditions, if everybody in the country were working, the remarks that have been made on the floor of the House for the past two days would make very interesting and amusing reading after a good supper. Under those conditions this party sniping and oratorical repartee would be amusing; but I want to say to the gentlemen who have described very graphically the critical economic conditions of the country and the needs of several millions of our fellow citizens that this is no time for Democratic or Republican politics and political speeches, but we should get right down to the task before us and commence doing real work immediately. Let us stop all this; complete organization so that our committees can get to work immediately. [Applause.] It would be far better for the country if we organized our committees and set to work.

It has been repeatedly stated that the crisis confronting the country to-day is as serious as it was when we were called into special session of the Sixty-fifth Congress in 1917, when this country entered the World War. I personally believe that it is. No one who served with me here can successfully accuse me of being unduly partisan. I distinctly remember that when we came here in the Sixty-fifth Congress it was not five minutes after we organized before President Wilson made his speech and we got down to business. I remember the venerable and distinguished gentleman from California, Mr. Julius Kahn, going arm in arm with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Dent, down to the War Department and coming back to their committee to prepare the necessary legislation. The same was true of the Committee on Appropriations; the Committee on Agriculture, in connection with the food bills; the Ways and Means Committee brought in the Liberty loan bill with a unanimous report. There was some slight crossing of issues at the time, but everyone pledged himself unselfishly to support the cause. The safety of the country was at stake, and a united Congress backed the President. Gentlemen, if we could do that in a crisis which was not as far-reaching as confronts us to-day, surely we ought to cut out politics now, get down to business, and do something for the millions of unemployed people. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not now.

I submit that there will be plenty of time for politics this fall. There will be plenty of opportunities for speeches during the campaign. There will be plenty of time for that.

I am not going to join issue with my genial friend from the city of New York [Mr. OLIVER], who talks about the unity of his party, but let me make one suggestion as an earnest of that unity: I wonder what he and his Tammany colleagues would do if his Democratic colleagues from the South should select as the Samuel Tilden of our day Judge Samuel Seabury as the Democratic presidential candidate next year? [Applause.] I would be inclined to vote for him if my Tammany friends would do likewise.

Gentlemen, the President sent his message to Congress. Again, I certainly can not qualify as a supporter of the administration. But there are certain recommendations in this message which should demand immediate consideration. Let us get to them. The message does not go far enough to suit me, but it is an index of our present ills and it is at least a starting point for legislative action. There are startling statements in the President's message which should immediately absorb the attention of the Congress. The President enumerates among the causes of our depression "unsound foreign investments and the mismanagement of financial institutions," and couples with it recommendations for a "sounder banking system." There is something for Congress to work on right now.

The President makes the further recommendation that there should be necessary changes made in our banking laws. Why not get the Committee on Banking and Currency busy on that at once? Another useful idea in the message is the statement that "Our people have a right to a banking system in which their deposits shall be safeguarded." Then there is the Federal reserve system which requires legislative attention, and yet no indication or seeming inclination to get down to business. The railways, antitrust laws, the Shipping Board; if we are to discuss the President's message would it not be far more constructive to take up these subjects for serious and pertinent consideration instead of continuing repeated recriminations? What greater subject is there than unemployment? Surely, we must do something. Talking about it and accusing each other will not solve the problem, neither will it appease the hunger of any unfortunate unemployed.

I want to submit to the gentleman who yesterday took the floor—and I know that many of you will not agree with me—that I can go down to the market here in Washington and buy a parrot for $2, and in one day I can teach it to say the word "Dole, dole, dole"; but that parrot would never understand an economic problem, no matter how long and how patiently it were explained to him. By the sinister use of the word "dole" and trying to stigmatize necessary and proper governmental relief, we are not going to solve this problem or avoid congressional responsibility. We have got to go to the fundamentals and we must do something affirmatively. No matter what you may call it, many hundreds of thousands of people in my city and many millions throughout the country are now the recipients of public charity. With all of the best of intentions and kindliness the situation is humiliating. I say, gentlemen, that the situation is very, very serious; so serious that I earnestly believe that the issue before us is not the success of the Democratic Party and it is not the success of the Republican Party. It is the very preservation of the Union. [Applause.]

We can not continue in this way. We may pull through this winter under the system and policy which we are following, namely, that of private charity, but we can not repeat it or keep it up indefinitely. Self-respecting Americans can and will not endure it much longer. Our unemployment situation is different than that of any other country. Even though the situation should become very much more satisfactory even though the stock ticker jumps up, even though the banking conditions should reach a normal point, we still would have unemployment in this country by reason of our efficient industries equipped with the best of machines, displacing labor and increasing production. You can not ignore the problem by talking politics. You can not becloud the issue by nagging the President. There will be time for that; but not now, please. I say we must take an inventory, we must face conditions, agree on actual existing facts, and then exchange views on our plans and argue on a sound constructive, legislative, and financial program.

Statements have been made to-day about the moratorium. I personally did not approve of the procedure followed by the President in committing the country before he had obtained authority and the consent of Congress. I believe that if it requires the consent of Congress now, and it does, he should have obtained that consent before even making the suggestions to foreign governments and committing the country. But permit me to remind my colleagues that the President took all partisan politics out of that question by first consulting and obtaining the approval of leading and authoritative spokesmen of both parties. I criticized the method at the time, but the fact remains, nevertheless, that it seemed like a bipartisan affair at the time. Why, here are some of the distinguished statesmen from the Democratic side who were consulted and, it appears, gave the President their approval and promise of cooperation: Senators ASHURST, FLETCHER, GLASS, HARRISON, HARRIS, CORDELL HULL, only recently a Member of this House, and Senators KING and SWANSON and also Senator WAGNER, of my State. Then there were Senators WALSH of Massachusetts and WALSH of Montana. And of our own colleagues, the distinguished gentlemen Mr. BYRNS, of Tennessee, and Mr. COLLIER, of Mississippi; CRISP and CULLEN, of our own Ways and Means Committee. What an array of distinguished Democrats. Then why all this talk about moratorium? [Applause.]

Let us be frank about these things. I publicly stated, within a few hours after the President's statement, that the procedure was wrong and unconstitutional. The deed has been done and discussion on the subject is now purely academic. The President has pledged the country, assurance of support has been given to him by both parties, the countries of Europe have taken the President's word, formal agreements have been exchanged, the world adjusted to this one year of grace, and what are you all going to do about it?

Now, as to cancellation or partial cancellation. That subject is not now before us. I am convinced that just as sure as night follows day it will be before us, and, perhaps, real soon. We can study the proposition in the meantime and be prepared to discuss it intelligently when the time does come. To all the determined gentlemen who have so forcefully stated, and who will state, that they are unalterably and unequivocally opposed to cancellation or readjustment of our foreign debt, I simply want to ask them to be prepared to declare when the time comes if they are prepared to send our Navy and our Army and to use force to collect these debts in their entirety should any of our debtor nations be unable to do so. What other alternative is there?

Mark you, gentlemen, every word that is said on the question of moratoriums, on the question of reparations and debts, is cabled and radioed all over the world. We have certain responsibilities here as Members of the House of Representatives, and it is idle at this time to talk about the moratorium when the spokesmen of both parties appeared there and publicly approved of the offer of a moratorium of one year.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is only required the perfunctory duty of Congress now to approve of it at this late day, whether we like it or not.

I am not speaking only for my city alone, and conditions are bad there, as they are bad all over the country, but this sniping that is going on, this political banter that is going on, is not satisfactory to the people who need the aid of the Congress.

I still believe in our representative form of government. I still believe in the powers and functions of Congress. We speak for the people; and at this time, while there is a small minority in the country that says, "Oh, Congress should adjourn; we do not want Congress," there are still several million people who look to us for protection and for the relief which they need. My appeal to the House now is, let us get our committees organized, let us present our bills, let us translate into action the best thought that our deliberations will bring forth, let us get around a conference table, and let us do something that the American people need and want from us at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, personally I am distressed at the discordant notes expressed from the Democratic side against the position of the President of the United States on the moratorium. If there is anything fundamental in the history of our Government and the history of all governments, it is that on foreign policy politics is adjourned. I had hoped that when I came down here that, so far as foreign policy was concerned, we would try to emulate the parties of Great Britain. When confronted with a similar serious economic situation, they sunk their partisan differences and joined in a national government. But, lo and behold, on the second day of the session, with two keynote expressions from the Democratic side, there is a united attack against the President because he espoused the moratorium!

The first speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] charges that it was in response to the moneyed interests of the country. The gentleman is present on the floor. If the gentleman had read the newspaper dispatches in authoritative journals, he would have known that the President took this position at the urgent request of the President of the Reich, General von Hindenburg. Confronted as Germany was with a serious economic problem of either admitting a political debacle, which meant revolution or the staying of that condition, President von Hindenburg made his appeal, and President Hoover proposed a moratorium. Did he do this on his own initiative, or did he do it by reason of the high position that the President of the United States should take in handling such foreign questions? He summoned, before any public declaration was made as to his position, the leading Republicans and Democrats on the Foreign Affairs Committees of the House and Senate.

I take issue with even the gentlemen on my side and also those on the Democratic side that it was a matter for Congress to pass upon. The treaty-making power of the Government is in the hands of the President. Just, perchance, because it involved the revenues of the Government, it was necessary to submit it to the Congress. If it had not been for that fact, the President would have been within the scope of his power in executing a treaty without conference with any of the leading Democrats and Republicans on our Foreign Affairs Committees of the respective Houses.

Criticism has been made that very little accrued as a result of the moratorium declared in June. If the gentleman had followed the newspapers current at that time, he would have known that it was the opinion of British publicists, American authorities, and German officials that the full benefit that was expected to come from the moratorium, the moral stimulus to international trade, was taken away because of the belated attitude of the Government of France in withholding her consent for more than a month. France was assuming the attitude of the dog in the manger, holding back the support to this Government that was rightly owing to this Government, because she feared, perchance, that it might result in a revival of trade or give life to the German Nation.

What a spectacle is this House to-day that shows its opposition to the policy of the President on this moratorium! At Basel there is a meeting at the present time under the Young plan of a committee of financial experts to determine whether Germany is able to make her conditional payments. Sir Ramsay MacDonald, according to the morning's dispatches, stated yesterday in the House of Commons that there must be an international conference to determine interallied government debts and reparations.

I subscribe to that position. I subscribe to the policy that it was unfair for our Government to have released France in this last Congress from the payment of more than 50 per cent of the war debt and compel Great Britain to pay more than 80 per cent of her war debt.

When the proposal first came on the floor of this House as to whether we would ratify the first debt settlement with Great Britain, I said in a 5-minute speech on the floor of the House that I hoped other foreign governments would emulate the policy of the British Government. [Applause.]

Great Britain, before the Baldwin-Mellon accord, had paid of its war debt voluntarily to our Government $100,000,000. Now, it is said that these war debts were based on the policy of the ability of the Government to pay. Ah, yes. But the Beranger-Mellon treaty with France was negotiated in 1925, when it was thought that France would not be in a position to pay more than 50 per cent of her debt.

When we ratified it in the last Congress—and I voted against it—France had revived, and only two months before she had canceled, $80,000,000 of luxury taxes. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], the Democratic member of the Debt Settlement Commission, advocated the approval of that outrageous settlement releasing France of more than 50 per cent of her debt, when we had made a settlement with Great Britain for more than 80 per cent of her debt.

I am in favor of fair play with governments as with individuals. [Applause.] If our policy is such that to-day we have exacted more than 80 per cent from Great Britain and released France from payment of more than 50 per cent of her debt, I say it is only fair to have some kind of negotiation to balance the payments.

Personally, I think it was a mistake to have any negotiations at all on the foreign debts. It was in the Congress immediately following the war when I was a member of the Committee on Appropriations that Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Leffingwell gave expression to what I regarded as comprising farseeing statesmanship.

As you know, all the moneys we had advanced to the various allied powers during the war were then represented by I O U's. Mr. Leffingwell said one day in the conference room of the Appropriations Committee that it would be a good policy for our Government to hold those I O U's, and press payment when the foreign governments might be taking an attitude contrary to the position of the United States.

After France received the renunciation of her debt to the United States of more than 50 per cent, her representatives at the conference last year in London on limitation of armaments took a position antagonistic to Great Britain and this Government, which will cost our Government $1,000,000,000 for increased naval armaments.

Mr. MICHENER. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not want to go into details about the question of reparations and debt settlements. They are related. We heard this morning, in the confusion among the membership of the House, the President's message on reparations and the moratorium in which he said he did not favor the further cancellation of these debts.

We can not revive industry in this country unless industrial conditions improve abroad. It was hoped that the suspension of all debt and reparation payments by all governments would result in the release of $240,000,000 for the time being, for the purchase of supplies in the revival of industry, which Germany would have been compelled otherwise to pay under the Young plan.

The effect of the moratorium has been to enable Germany to pay $100,000,000 on its short-term credit notes since, and she also obtained a new lease on life for the time being. It is my personal opinion, and my opinion is strengthened by the opinion of the secretary of the reparations committee under the Versailles treaty, Sir Andrew McFayden, and also by that great British economist, John Maynard Keynes, that the amount exacted under the Versailles treaty for Germany to pay is absolutely impossible of payment.

The problem comes up now, and we will have to meet it some time. I am one of those who is not an isolationist. I do not believe in your tariff policy of self-containment. It is true I voted for the tariff bill, but with reluctance, only because it carried, as I said on the floor of the House, a duty on that one article, leather, which was on the free list and was necessary to rehabilitate an important industry that was prostrate in my own city. [Laughter.] Yes, and every other vote that I cast was for the lowest duties possible. Yes, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] voted consistently for high duties on such as sugar, just as I voted consistently against them. Why is not Cuba, which is one of our best customers, entitled to the same consideration as if she were a part of the Union.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. No.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is not sugar cheaper to-day than ever before?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, that is a cheap argument to use.

Mr. KNUTSON. You bet your life it is.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman knew anything about the economics of the world in the matter of sugar, he would know that it is due to overproduction of sugar in Cuba, which is now being attempted to be reduced under the Chadbourne agreement.

Mr. KNUTSON. But the fact remains that it has not resulted in an increase in the price of sugar.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the fact also remains that the Western Sugar Co. which controls 45 per cent of the beet-sugar industry in this country had made millions of dollars the year prior to the passage of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that these Republicans ought to treat each other decently. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. I decline to yield. This sugar company made more than $10,000,000 that year. Getting back to the original postulate, I am not an isolationist. I believe fundamentally that if business is going to revive in this country we must see to it that business abroad must revive. You criticize the policy of our large manufacturers in establishing plants abroad. Take, for instance the motor industry. It is a natural corollary for our manufacturers to establish plants abroad if other countries erect tariff barriers against our imports. Yet one of the engineers of the Ford Motor Co. tells me that America can manufacture automobiles more cheaply in this country under its mass production and ship them abroad and pay the freight, than they can be manufactured in Great Britain, France, and the other continental countries.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, talk on reparations.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not need to take instructions from the brilliant luminary from the dense woods of Minnesota. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me have three minutes more.

Mr. PURNELL. I say to the gentleman that I have made some commitments, but——

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw my request of the gentleman from Indiana and accept the time from the Democratic side. I made a reasonable request of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. PURNELL. Let me say this to the gentleman——

Mr. STAFFORD. I decline to yield.

Mr. PURNELL. Just one moment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I decline to yield.

Mr. PURNELL. But the gentleman did not understand me. I said that I had made some commitments, but I was preparing to give the gentleman three minutes more. As a matter of fact, the gentleman ought to get his time over there if he is going to make a speech of that kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. I say to the gentleman from Indiana that I represent just as good Republican doctrine as does the gentleman from Indiana. If I, perchance, do not believe in the policy of the Republican Party for self-containment in raising tariff barriers so high that we compel other countries to do likewise, I am still consistent with my fundamentals in believing in a protective tariff. I have never been a believer in prohibitive tariffs. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I think I reflect the views of the big industrialists, of the big manufacturers, who need foreign export trade, in saying that our tariff has gone high enough. I subscribe to that doctrine. I do not intend to dupe my people at home or to dupe the people of the country at large, or to violate my fundamental position upon the question of the tariff.

A serious question confronts the world. I really believe that reparations and government debts go hand in hand, but I would not subscribe to a reduction in government debts so far as France is concerned, because we have been more than generous with France. However, if the reparation payments that Germany is required to pay are reduced, I would subscribe to a lowering of the debt that Great Britain is compelled to pay.

If there is any government to-day that is in financial distress, it is that of Great Britain. France was wallowing in prosperity as a result of the tribute that Germany was paying to her, as a result of the reparation payments. Those reparations were merely advance payments extended to her by British and American loans, to enable her to revive, which she used for payment of reparations. This is a serious question, and we are going to have to face it. I think it is a mistake for this Congress, with the sentiment in the country in favor of getting together on foreign policies, to antagonize the President when he has been acting in a nonpartisan manner. He did everything that he possibly could to get the accord of both Republicans and Democrats.

I am hopeful that before we take our holiday recess there will be brought into this Congress a bill to support the President in his moratorium policy.

As was declared in the message this morning, it is merely to suspend the payment and provide for its payment during the 10 years that follow. There is no release. He did say in the message that perhaps there might be occasions to grant moratoria to other governments. To that I subscribe. We are part and parcel of a great family, dependent upon one another, and if we are going to succeed we must look to the others to succeed. If our neighbor does not thrive we can not expect to thrive. We can protect our own markets without them being made a dumping ground for Russia or other governments where the scale of living is much lower than ours; but, it is not necessary to make the tariff policy so high that nothing can be brought in here.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I will not yield. So, I appeal to you for harmony and agreement as far as the moratorium is concerned, whereby we can put up a solid front to support the President of the United States in his foreign policy, where he is seeking to accomplish the best results for the entire world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has expired.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I was perfectly sincere when I asked the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] to place in his speech the tariff schedules to which he objects. With a great deal of pleasure, in behalf of and representing the people of Kansas and the Central West, I voted for the tariff bill. I voted for it because it gave to agriculture the highest protective rates that had ever been enacted into law since the beginning of the Government. The Tariff Commission, composed of three Democrats and three Republicans, has said that of the increases in the 1930 tariff bill over the 1922 tariff bill agriculture received 68 per cent and industry 32 per cent. It might perhaps be that one would be so selfish that he would liked to have had 95 per cent or a hundred per cent for agriculture, but when I got twice the increases for agriculture that were given to industry I was fairly well satisfied. The Tariff Commission has said that of the imports into this country, 67 per cent come in free of duty. Agriculture profits largely by that free-duty list. Practically everything the farmer uses in any quantity comes in free of duty. So, to my mind, the tariff bill of 1930 was so decidedly in favor of agriculture that no man who knew anything about it and represented an agricultural district should have voted against it.

Ever since that bill was passed I have heard statements by Democrats and near Democrats about it being a terribly outrageous bill, and I have been asking the gentlemen who make those statements to name the rates on articles to which they object. I want to know what their objections are. The Democratic governor of my State sent a wire to the President last summer in which he complained of the high tariff rates, and I wrote him an open letter, and I thought a very courteous one, and asked him to name the rates to which he objected. I have had no answer. Others have made similar statements but fail to name the rates they claim are objectionable. So, when I heard my good friend from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] say that the tariff rates were the cause of the depression in this country, I asked him to "name his poison," meaning the rates to which he objects, as my good friend Cliff Stratton, of the Topeka Capital, referred to the request I made in my letter to our governor. I am sincere about it. I would like to know what the rates are that are so objectionable. It may well be that I will agree with the gentleman when he names them, but I would like to have some one for the first time state what those rates are that are too high, and I hope my friend from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] will include in his remarks a list of the tariff rates to which he objects and which he thinks are so unjust, for what I fear is that the effort will be made to reduce or put on the free list agricultural products, as was done in 1913 under the Wilson administration.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. I just want to direct the gentleman's attention to the fact that the gentleman said the tariff on agriculture was the highest it has ever been in the history of this country.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That is correct.

Mr. STEVENSON. I also want to direct the gentleman's attention to the fact that the great staple products of agriculture in this country have been the lowest since that time that they have ever been in the history of this country.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That may be. I know that overproduction and the depression which follows every war have brought depression in the price of agricultural products. We have had the lowest prices we have had in years. But does the gentleman think or believe we can help agriculture by taking the tariff rates off agricultural products and permitting the dumping of foreign agricultural products into this country free of duty? If the gentleman believes that, or if anyone else believes that, Democrat or Republican, I would like them to put in the RECORD a list of the rates they would like to reduce.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman certainly did not raise them by raising the tariff, did he?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes; until the depression came. But does the gentleman think he will raise them by lowering the tariff on such products? If so, please put in the RECORD the rates he would so reduce. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

TARIFF AND TAXATION

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, the speeches made in the Committee of the Whole yesterday by the new majority were certainly a source of much satisfaction to the minority. I listened attentively practically all day for any words of wisdom from the friends across the aisle, but, aside from the very cleverly arranged political talk by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the element of quality was missing. A lot of quantity but no quality.

The information we secured was that after due deliberation and consultation, in which doubtless Mr. Raskob and his satellites will have an important say, we will eventually know what form of tax program the Democrats intend to suggest. The nearer it comes to the advice offered yesterday by the President in his Budget message and the closer it follows the suggestions of the Secretary of the Treasury, the better it will be for the country. [Applause.] I am one of those who have always felt that the present Secretary of the Treasury is a man of keen judgment and thoroughly interested in the well-being of his fellow citizens. In spite of the ridicule and sarcasm which have been flung at him on this floor by the new majority in past Congresses he stands out as a man of marked financial ability. I much prefer to follow one who has had the confidence of three Presidents in the trying financial times following the World War than the most fully digested opinion which can be produced by the combined wisdom of our Democratic opponents.

As far as my vote is concerned, in a general way I am going along with the Secretary of the Treasury rather than following the dictation of men outside of Congress to whom the Democratic majority may or may not be beholden for great financial assistance.

While congratulating the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] on the speech he made yesterday, I wish to take particular exception to one paragraph, which reads as follows:

> You must be convinced that it was because in the deliberate opinion of all these districts which have changed their Representatives that the Republican Party in Congress was no longer fit to govern the affairs of the Nation. You can not reach any other logical conclusion.

I heard the gentleman utter these sentences and he appeared to be in earnest. However, knowing of the gentleman's marked ability and good judgment, I am inclined to feel that his remarks carried with them an element of sarcasm. He gives no reason why he reaches that conclusion other than to be boastful about the change of representation and districts. If there is any intention at logical argument in that assertion the gentleman overlooks several changes of judgment that the people have made in previous years. He may recall by what a narrow margin the late President Wilson was elected to his second term and how completely those who supported him were deceived by the slogan, "He has kept us out of war." He may recall that at the beginning of the Democratic administration in 1913 there were but 134 Republicans in Congress. Six years thereafter there was a sufficient number to elect Frederick H. Gillett as Speaker of the House. Will the gentleman from Alabama admit that in that brief time the country became fully convinced that the Democratic Party "was no longer fit to govern the affairs of the Nation"? No, my friends; such is not the case.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman allow me to answer that?

Mr. TREADWAY. Of course, having referred to the gentleman, I will be glad to yield to him.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As a matter of logic, I could come to no other legitimate conclusion.

Mr. TREADWAY. That the Democratic Party was no longer fit to rule the affairs of the Nation?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the circumstances, that must have been the judgment of the country.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman is an honest spokesman for Democracy. I thought he had overlooked the fact that the people repudiated Woodrow Wilson and the Congress. Evidently that was not fair to him; and I agree, therefore, with the gentleman that our conclusions are alike.

I am proud that I am a rabid Republican, but I am not so rabid as to say that any great disaster can come to this great country of ours because one or the other of the two great parties happens to be in power. We have survived Democratic administrations and we have survived Democratic control of the House. We all hope to survive the present control, especially in view of the very narrow margin by which that control is exercised. It is possible that the Republican side may be able to offer a little leaven to the Democratic loaf which will save the country from disaster.

I understand from the majority floor leader that for the next three days we are to continue, ostensibly, to discuss the President's message. Practically, so far as the majority is concerned, it will give an opportunity for them to boast of Democratic successes, condole with the Republicans, and abuse the administration. Let us hope that during that period the country may be favored with information as to how the Democratic Party intends to rehabilitate the finances of the Nation. The minority anticipates that some of the attacks on the administration will follow along worn-out and threadbare lines in shouting from the housetops the iniquity of the Smoot-Hawley tariff law and some of the same old criticisms of the present income tax law.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] asked gentlemen on the Democratic side of the aisle to specifically name rates in the Smoot-Hawley bill which are objectionable, but they failed to do so.

Since the adjournment of Congress in March Democratic spokesmen have been endeavoring to delude the people as to the supposed evils of the 1930 tariff law. In every speech I have read they have tried to convince the people that the rates in the Smoot-Hawley Act have been the cause of the decrease in our foreign trade and the levying of duties in some foreign countries against exports from this country. Several times I have raised my feeble voice in asking for a bill of particulars covering specific rates. Never has there been a response, never a particular or detail has been forthcoming. We therefore are justified in the conclusion that these spokesmen have been insincere in their criticisms and that they have made their statements purely for political effect.

We had one of our own Members [Mr. STAFFORD] a short time ago make the general statement that he did not believe in a prohibitive tariff. I do not know of any man who does. There is not any such thing as a prohibitive tariff in the law, and there is no such a thing as a prohibitive tariff rate in the Smoot-Hawley bill. I stand on that statement and I would be glad to yield to anybody who wants to contradict it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. How does the gentleman regard the duty on manganese? For 30 years there was no duty to speak of on manganese, yet under the Fordney bill the rate of duty was raised 250 per cent on manganese, and it was continued in the Hawley bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, well, you can pick up an item here and there that is not prohibitive but may be out of line, and in a moment I am going to refer to a method by which you can cure that situation. I see my friend from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON] on his feet. He is an advocate of a tariff on manganese, and I know he is very anxious to explain that situation. He explained it to the committee two years ago, but I do not think he got anything like what he asked for. Therefore, there is no indication of that being a prohibitive rate.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. If the gentleman will permit, the only trouble with the duty on manganese is that it ought to be twice as much as it is to be effective.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is your answer from people who own manganese mines. The gentleman from South Dakota is as interested in his district in mining manganese as the gentleman from Wisconsin is interested in the manufacture of shoes in his district. He says from his own information that the duty on manganese ought to be double what it is. Now, that seems to me to take care of the objection to the manganese schedule as far as the gentleman from Wisconsin is concerned.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. FISH. The fact is we are practically producing no manganese now due to competition from Soviet Russia.

Mr. TREADWAY. Absolutely. There is competition from abroad, and the gentleman from South Dakota brought that out very fully at the hearings before the committee.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to my colleague from New York that in this instance the Steel Trust and the communists of Russia are working together.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. TREADWAY. Now, let us get back to the main subject which I am discussing.

Our tariff friends or antitariff friends are making great claims that the Smoot-Hawley bill has reduced importations. How absurd this argument is. The actual reason for the falling off of importations of foreign goods and of the manufacture of domestic goods is so apparent that he who runs may read.

For many years this country has been a creditor nation and the quantity of our output has been based upon the demand for our goods in other countries. In every country in Europe, save one, industrial recovery since the World War has been retarded. In 1927–28 the climax was reached and unemployment became apparent. This condition became so serious in Great Britain that the very unwise dole system was adopted. I think enough was said about that yesterday and enough ammunition was provided us by one of the Democratic spokesmen, at least, to cover that subject for the time being.

The natural result of the depression was a lessened demand for our goods abroad, which by the latter part of 1928 and early 1929 affected our home markets and our home production.

It is true we have regarded the tariff as a means of maintaining American standards, the American scale of living, and American wages. We have only to recall conditions at the time of our entrance into the World War for proof of the demerits of the Democratic tariff doctrine. The depression in this country was of a domestic nature. To-day it is world-wide, and it has no connection whatever with tariff rates. If world conditions had remained normal, this country would have benefited greatly from the rates contained in the Smoot-Hawley Act, as that act applied the tariff policy to many new industries which had arisen since the Fordney-McCumber Act was written. The Smoot-Hawley Act was a necessary adjunct for the preservation of American production.

So many changes had come up since the period of the writing of the Fordney-McCumber Act that we needed to bring tariff legislation up to date, and we did, I feel, a most excellent job, and one with which practically no fault can be found.

It may be interesting to note the percentages of ad valorem values levied under the last seven tariff acts. They are as follows:

	Per cent
McKinley	48.39
Wilson	41.29
Dingley	46.49
Payne	40.73
Underwood	26.97
Fordney	38.22
Hawley	47.70

The last figure, 47.70 per cent, has been furnished by the United States Tariff Commission based on actual figures for the year ending June 1, 1931.

This is the best evidence that the small increases contained in the Smoot-Hawley law could not possibly have disturbed the economic conditions of the world. As the gentleman from Kansas has already done, let me also call attention to the well-known fact that the majority of the increases in the 1930 act are in the agricultural schedule, and the Secretary of Agriculture in his annual report states they have been of great benefit to agriculture in reducing the quantity of agricultural importations.

There are ample illustrations in industrial lines of the benefits to specific industries. No better illustration is available than the boot and shoe schedule, where, next to the agricultural schedule, the largest number of increases was made. The effect has been apparent throughout the shoe-manufacturing area.

The Smoot-Hawley Act was so plainly beneficial to the shoe industry that my good friend and colleague [Mr. CONNERY] from the Lynn district of Massachusetts, voted for the bill. I am glad to say that we also had the support of 20 Democrats, all told, for the benefits that the Smoot-Hawley Act brought to their respective States or districts.

We await the opportunity to respond to the expected criticisms of the Democrats relative to the tariff law. Should they undertake any general tariff legislation during the coming session, it would be a definite indication of their effort to develop some form of political capital. The delays in the passage of the last tariff bill, particularly in the other branch, were premeditated and intentional in order to confuse the minds of the voters in the congressional election of 1930. A further effort of this kind at the present session will be proof that they wish to make a political football out of the industries of the country by creating a feeling of uncertainty in the minds of the people as to the possibility of tariff changes as the time for election approaches.

A cure for tariff errors or mistakes, if any are contained in the present law, is already provided by the flexible provision of that very same law. As evidence of this, the Tariff Commission reports that, as the result of applications of various industries and agricultural concerns, it has reviewed the tariff rates on more than 250 items subject to duty during the past year. The commission is current with its work and is in a position to give immediate attention to further requests for changes that may come to it.

Another evidence of the fact that the 1930 tariff law has benefited industry and agriculture is shown by the records of the Division of Customs of the Treasury Department. On commodities free under both the present and previous tariff laws there has been a decrease of only 6.2 per cent in importations, which would seem to indicate the decreased purchasing power of the public. On the other hand, the decrease in dutiable commodities since the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley law has been 41.3 per cent, showing that the law is having exactly the effect which its framers contemplated. The difference, 35.1 per cent, may properly be construed as representing the additional consumption of domestic products, both industrial and agricultural.

As a matter of interest I insert the following:

Receipts from customs duties for the last 19 years have been as follows:

1913–1931, inclusive

Year:	Amount
1913	$318,891,395.86
1914	292,320,014.51
1915	209,786,672.21
1916	213,185,845.63
1917	225,962,393.38
1918	179,998,383.49
1919	184,457,867.39
1920	322,902,650.39
1921	308,564,391.00
1922	356,443,387.18
1923	561,928,866.66
1924	545,637,503.99
1925	547,561,226.11
1926	579,430,092.86
1927	605,499,983.44
1928	568,986,188.50
1929	602,262,786.17
1930	587,000,903.25
1931	378,354,005.35
Total, 19 years	7,589,174,557.37
Average	399,430,239.86

It can be seen from the above figures that the tariff, at the present time, is not one of the most important sources of our revenue. The $378,000,000 collected in 1931 represents approximately 11 per cent of our total ordinary receipts for that year. It will be observed further that, in spite of the fact that the revenue from the tariff decreased about $200,000,000 in 1931 over 1930, nevertheless, the collections for 1931 were only $20,000,000 below the average collections for the 19-year period, 1913 to 1931, inclusive.

It can be seen from the above that as far as the revenue is concerned the tariff is not an extremely important matter, comparatively speaking. As an economic matter the tariff is more necessary than ever, because since the passage of the last tariff act the cost of labor in foreign countries has decreased, making protection only the more necessary. I believe that the Tariff Commission is proceeding in an orderly and scientific manner in making such increases or decreases as the economic welfare of this country demands.

SUGGESTIONS FOR NEW REVENUE FROM TAXATION

Let me now pass to a consideration of the President's Budget message, which refers to the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to additional taxation.

RÉSUMÉ OF THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET MESSAGE

Actual deficit for fiscal year 1931 was $902,000,000.

Estimated deficit for fiscal year 1932 is $2,123,000,000.

Estimated deficit for fiscal year 1933 is $1,417,000,000.

These deficits are estimated on our present system of taxation, but after taking account of economies in expenditures recommended for the fiscal year 1933:

The actual expenditures for 1931 were $4,091,000,000.

The estimated expenditures for 1932 are $4,361,000,000.

The estimated expenditures for 1933 are $3,996,000,000.

In respect to the above deficits for the fiscal years 1932 and 1933, the President recommends increased taxes "upon the general plan of taxation which existed under the revenue act of 1924 with such changes as may be appropriate in the light of altered conditions."

The plan of taxation proposed is estimated to increase the revenue by $390,000,000 for the fiscal year 1932 and by $920,000,000 for the fiscal year 1933.

These increases, if put into effect, would reduce the estimated deficits shown at the beginning of this résumé to $1,730,000,000 for 1932 and to $497,000,000 for 1933.

This total burden is distributed as follows:

	1932	1933
Individuals with net incomes over $100,000	$50,000,000	$111,000,000
Individuals with net incomes between $10,000 and $100,000	16,500,000	37,000,000
Individuals with net incomes less than $10,000	16,500,000	37,000,000
Total on individuals	83,000,000	185,000,000
Total on corporations	27,000,000	60,000,000
Grand total, increase on individuals and corporations	110,000,000	245,000,000

It should also be noted in connection with the income tax on individuals that the 1924 act carried lower exemptions than the present act. A single man having a net income of over $1,000 made a return under the 1924 act, while at present he does not make a return unless he has a net income of $1,500. The exemption for a married man under the 1924 act was $2,500 instead of $3,500 allowed at present. The result of thus lowering the personal exemptions will be to add about 1,700,000 individuals to the number of our income-tax payers.

In regard to miscellaneous taxes, the Secretary departs somewhat from the plan provided for under the revenue act of 1924. He recommends a return to the automobile taxes of that act which carried rates of 5 per cent on ordinary automobiles, 3 per cent on trucks, and 2½ per cent on automobile accessories. He recommends a tax of 10 per cent on all theater admissions in excess of 10 cents. This represents a return to the 1921 act, as the 1924 act only taxed admissions in excess of 50 cents. He recommends a tax of 5 per cent on manufacturers' sales of radio and phonograph equipment. This is a new tax which we have never had. He recommends a stamp tax on sales of realty of 50 cents for each $500 of value. He recommends an increase of 16⅔ per cent in the present rates on tobacco manufactures and cigarettes, but does not increase the rate on cigars. He recommends an increase of from 5 cents per $100 to 6 cents per $100 in the existing stamp tax on capital stock sales. He recommends a return to the tax imposed on telegraph, telephone, cable, and radio messages imposed by the revenue act of 1921. Finally, he recommends a stamp tax of 2 cents on every bank check and draft. This tax has not been used since the Spanish-American War.

The Secretary estimates that the additional revenue to be secured from the above taxes would amount to $205,000,000 in 1932 and to $514,000,000 in 1933.

The Secretary recommends a small increase in the estate tax, which would return only $11,000,000 additional revenue in the fiscal year 1933 and about $22,000,000 additional in the fiscal year 1934. The Secretary further recommends that postal rates be increased so that added revenue of $75,000,000 may be secured for 1932 and $150,000,000 for 1933.

The principal features of the revenue act of 1924 which the Secretary apparently does not consider should be revived are as follows:

(1) The gift tax; (2) the capital-stock tax; (3) miscellaneous taxes on cigars, jewelry, paintings, shooting galleries, pool rooms, and the like.

The plan proposed is estimated to increase the revenue by $390,000,000 for 1932 and $920,000,000 for 1933. This increase if put into effect would reduce the estimated deficit to $1,750,000,000 in 1932 and $499,000,000 in 1933.

Now, that is the comprehensive proposition which has been placed before us in the Budget message.

Here are the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury as regards increased taxes. I for one feel, and I am joined by the views of my colleagues, that there must be additional taxes. We can not get away from it, as much as we would like to. Taxation is never popular; but, nevertheless, a situation has developed which necessitates these taxes.

The proposed increases in income taxes are:

Increase normal rates as follows: On first $4,000 of net income from 1½ per cent to 2 per cent; on second $4,000 of net income from 3 per cent to 4 per cent; on net income over $8,000 from 5 per cent to 6 per cent.

Increase surtax rates as follows: On net incomes from $10,000 to $26,000 no change; on net income from $26,000 to $28,000 from 7 per cent to 8 per cent; on net incomes from $28,000 to $30,000 from 8 per cent to 9 per cent; and so on consistently as indicated by the following brackets selected at intervals: On net incomes from $50,000 to $52,000 from 13 per cent to 18 per cent; on net incomes from $74,000 to $76,000 from 18 per cent to 27 per cent; on net incomes from

$98,000 to $100,000 from 19 per cent to 36 per cent; on net incomes from $200,000 to $300,000 from 20 per cent to 38 per cent; on net incomes from $300,000 to $500,000 from 20 per cent to 39 per cent; on net incomes of over $500,000 from 20 per cent to 40 per cent.

Increase flat rate on corporations from 12 per cent to 12½ per cent.

These changes result from the application of the rates imposed by the revenue act of 1924. The total effect on the revenue is estimated to be a total increase for the fiscal year 1932 of $110,000,000 and for the fiscal year 1933 of $245,000,000.

There is also a very explicit and complete description in the Secretary's report as to exemptions. I think that it is fair that we lower the exemptions and, therefore, include a certain class within the tax limit that are receiving a fair salary. It would be so small to each individual as not to have the slightest effect on his exchequer or budget program. I am sure the American people feel satisfied to render this aid to the finances of the country, particularly if the Secretary's recommendations are carried out that the increases should be only temporary.

I personally do not entirely follow the Secretary of the Treasury as to the increase in some of the other taxes, but I am not going into the details of that.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; but first let me get some additional time if I can. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield me an additional five minutes?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is a distinguished member of the Committee on Ways and Means. How low would the gentleman go on exemptions?

Mr. TREADWAY. I was just starting to say that these preliminary remarks are purely general in nature. The gentleman from Texas is well aware that the Committee on Ways and Means sits practically continuously in hearing all sides of these questions; and while we differ politically from our majority colleagues, I feel that eventually we are going to get together. Until such time as the details are worked out, not only in relation to how low we would go on exemptions but on other matters of great detail, I should prefer not to express a positive opinion, because otherwise I would be prejudging the evidence that will be submitted to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BLANTON. How low does the gentleman's President and Secretary of the Treasury propose to go? They are the ones now asking that small wages be taxed.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think I have it right here, and I will read it to the gentleman. I was not going to take the time, but I shall be glad to read the reference that the Secretary of the Treasury makes. He says:

> It should also be noted in connection with the income tax on individuals that the 1924 act carried lower exemptions than the current act. A single man having a net income of over a thousand dollars made a return under the 1924 act, while at the present time he does not make a return unless he has a net income of $1,500. The exemption for a married man under the 1924 act was $2,500 instead of $3,500 allowed at present. The result of this lowering of personal exemptions will be to add 1,700,000 individuals to the number of our income-tax payers.

That is, provided we go as low as the 1924 exemptions, and I am not at all convinced that we should go that low. I think that is as definite as I could answer the gentleman's inquiry until the testimony is actually submitted to the committee.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield to a question for information?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Is the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury that the proposal will yield $110,000,000 additional revenue for 1932 and $245,000,000 for 1933, based upon his judgment of the prospective recovery of the country, or on actual conditions?

Mr. TREADWAY. Some may be on that basis. The gentleman is probably aware that the fiscal year closes June 30, and, therefore, in the payments we make next year there will be only two quarters of the 1931 year go into that $110,000,000, whereas for the 1932 year there would be a total of the 12 months. Does that answer the gentleman?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. But, if the gentleman will permit, we pay income tax on the basis of the calendar year.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is true; but it would not have its effect on the Treasury. I think I have explained it satisfactorily. That is the explanation, that in that figure of $110,000,000 there is only one-half of the actual fiscal year included in the receipts of the Treasury.

I am not altogether willing at the present time to commit myself to some of the suggestions offered by the Secretary of the Treasury in connection with excise taxes. We will have an opportunity to discuss that later. I am, however, a thorough believer in the increase in inheritance taxes. I have been one of those who in the past have felt that the inheritance tax to a very large extent should be left to the States as a method of securing revenue. For many reasons, which I have not the time to state, I am not quite so positive in that opinion now as I formerly was, but I do think that we should not disturb the present law on which many States have acted in order to secure a return of 80 per cent of inheritance taxes. The Government to-day gets only 20 per cent of inheritance taxes, the 80 per cent going back to the States. I think whatever we do now in the way of increasing inheritance taxes should be solely for the use of the Federal Government, even if we duplicate the present law and collect double the amount of inheritance taxes. I think the suggested law should be a direct receipt on the part of the Federal Government.

I thoroughly agree also with the attitude of the Secretary of the Treasury that the whole amount of the deficit can not possibly be met through new taxation. This Congress must be most economical without being parsimonious. It will also be necessary to float an additional funded indebtedness. The indebtedness of the country has gone down so much in the last few years that it is perfectly right that there should be a little addition placed on the debt burden at the present time.

Mr. ALMON. I presume the gentleman's reason for the statement that all of the increase in the inheritance tax be given to the Federal Government is on account of the deficit. Is it not a fact that many of the States are in as great need of additional taxes as the Federal Government?

Mr. TREADWAY. The States of course will be obliged to find means of paying their own bills and taking care of their own burdens. I think we have job enough to take care of the Federal Government's burdens.

Mr. ALMON. But the States have adopted the inheritance tax with a very distinct understanding in respect to what the United States will do.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am not touching that. The gentleman did not understand. So far as the old law is concerned I thoroughly approve of leaving that exactly as it is, because many of the legislatures of the States have enacted laws based on the return of 80 per cent.

Mr. ALMON. But if we increase it for the Federal Government why not give the States the benefit of the increase as well as the Federal Government?

Mr. TREADWAY. That is another question. I think we are dealing generously by the States in connection with the estate tax now.

Of course, there is a supplement to the inheritance tax in the form of a gift tax. I will not touch upon that at this time. But if the people are avoiding large payments of inheritance taxes by making gifts before death, perhaps that hole ought to be plugged. There are numerous other holes in the income tax law whereby we can find additional means of revenue after due study by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. I know that the gentleman has given careful study to this question. How high does the gentleman feel the dead line should be moved as the point where we have a flat rate on income?

Mr. TREADWAY. I personally can not conceive of incomes of around $1,000,000 or even $500,000. I can not picture anybody having an income of a million dollars a year, but there are a good many in this country who have such incomes; and I think when we get up to $500,000 we should double the present surtax rates. They are now 20 per cent on incomes of $100,000 and up. There is nothing higher than the 20 per cent bracket. I think we made reductions much faster than we should have done from the high incomes.

As a matter of record I insert the surtax rates on individual incomes in the various income tax acts.

SURTAXES ON INDIVIDUAL INCOMES

1913 act: From 1 per cent on incomes of $20,000 to $50,000 up to 6 per cent on incomes of over $500,000.

1916 act: From 1 per cent on incomes of $20,000 to $50,000 up to 13 per cent on incomes of over $2,000,000.

1917 act: From 1 per cent on incomes of $5,000 to $7,500 up to 63 per cent on incomes of over $2,000,000.

1918 act: From 1 per cent on incomes of $5,000 to $6,000 up to 65 per cent on incomes of over $1,000,000.

1921 act: From 1 per cent on incomes of $6,000 to $10,000 up to 50 per cent on incomes of over $200,000.

1924 act: From 1 per cent on incomes of $10,000 to $14,000 up to 40 per cent on incomes of over $500,000.

1926 act: From 1 per cent on incomes of $10,000 to $14,000 up to 20 per cent on incomes of over $100,000.

1928 act: Same as 1926 act.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is that rate on incomes of $100,000 or $200,000?

Mr. TREADWAY. Everything above $100,000 pays a flat 20 per cent.

I thank the House for its attention. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. I have just one more speech of five minutes, if the gentleman will allow me to use that at this time?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It is my purpose to ask that the committee rise at 4 o'clock; and since I had promised 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], and that he shall continue to-morrow if he can not finish within that time, I desire to yield time to him now.

I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] with the understanding that if he does not finish his speech I will yield him additional time to-morrow morning.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, H. R. No. 1, which I introduced at the beginning of this session, provides for the immediate payment to veterans of the World War the face or maturity value of their adjusted-service certificates. That is the subject which I desire to talk to you about this afternoon.

ALL FACTS NOT PUBLISHED

All the facts in favor of full cash payment have not been published. The facts I shall present will doubtless be astounding to many people; but they will be facts. Every statement made by me in this speech can be substantiated.

DEBT CONFESSED BY CONGRESS

Three million six hundred thousand veterans of the World War hold adjusted-service certificates. These certificates are often referred to as "bonus certificates." They are not "bonus certificates" and do not represent a bonus, subsidy, or gratuity. They represent an honest debt that has been publicly confessed by the Congress of the United States to the veterans of the World War for services rendered. They were really due October 1, 1931.

H. R. 1 FOR FULL PAYMENT

Congress should immediately pass a bill authorizing the full cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates. My bill, H. R. 1, introduced the first day of Congress, provides for full cash payment without deducting interest since October 1, 1931.

VETERANS GRATEFUL

The veterans of the World War are grateful to the Government for the benefits extended to them. However, no new policy or principle of our Government has been adopted for their benefit. They, their widows, and orphans are not receiving as much from the Government as veterans of other wars and their widows and orphans are receiving.

CASH PAYMENT SEPARATE QUESTION

The question of cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates should be considered separate and apart from any other legislation for the benefit of World War veterans. The Congress has already confessed the debt, including the amount, for services rendered. Only the question of payment remains to be considered.

MISLEADING PROPAGANDA

During hard times there is always an effort made by the ones most responsible for the country's condition to distract attention from the real cause by endeavoring to turn the people against their chosen Representatives in Congress, who are making an attempt to restore equal opportunity. This is usually undertaken through veiled and misleading propaganda.

CONGRESS WILL CARRY OUT THE WILL OF THE PEOPLE

Practically 100 per cent of the Members of Congress, House and Senate, will carry out the will of their constituents if their constituents will make their wishes known to them.

INFORMED CITIZENSHIP

The people to-day are better informed and understand more about their Government than ever before. It is becoming increasingly difficult for the internationalists and the holders of special privilege to successfully mislead the people by distorting, withholding, and misrepresenting facts in order to cover up their own iniquities.

SIDE OF THE PLAIN PEOPLE

The plain people do not have so very many newspapers on their side, and they are not given so much time on the air, but, as the wage earner does more thinking on the park bench than he did at the work bench, the plain people are doing considerable thinking for themselves during this time of economic stress.

The veteran's problem is the problem of the plain people. Most of the veterans belong to that great middle class. It is that class that has done so much for this country. They are the ones who build our country in time of peace and who save our country in time of war. If they are made prosperous, everybody will be prosperous; they have the consuming power.

The plain people will be greatly benefited by the payment of the adjusted-service certificates. A benefit to them is a benefit to the Nation.

We are merely asking for the payment of an honest debt, confessed by the Congress of the United States in 1924, to the veterans of the World War, for services rendered.

SHOULD BE PAID IN FULL, IN CASH, NOW

The face or maturity value of each certificate is past due. They must be paid some time. If paid now, both veterans and the country will be benefited. The additional purchasing power such payment will afford is badly needed in our country at this time.

COMPOUND INTEREST WILL CONSUME REMAINDER

Veterans residing in every nook and corner of America hold these certificates. They are for sums ranging from $126 to $1,590 each, of the average value of $1,000. Under both the old and new laws about $1,300,000,000 have been borrowed by the veterans; they have borrowed their own money and have agreed to pay 4½ per cent interest, compounded annually, for it. The interest will practically consume the certificate of the veteran who has borrowed the limit allowed by law. Two billion two hundred million dollars will pay the balance due on all the certificates. Only the uninformed or the veterans' enemies contend that the Government can not conveniently make this payment now. The Government can be saved tens of millions of dollars a year in administration expense by making the payment now and at the same time save the veterans, their widows, and orphans tens of millions of dollars annually on compound interest. For a veteran to be required to pay interest for his own money is bad enough, but to require him to pay "compound interest" is adding insult to injury.

GET THE TRUTH TO THE PEOPLE

This is not a question of sympathy. It is a business proposition. A great principle is involved. That is, shall the Government liquidate this debt in the same way that debts owed by the Government to others are liquidated? If so, it should be paid in cash now. The veterans do not want sympathy, they want understanding. We will be victorious when the people understand that our request is both right and reasonable. Our problem is getting the truth to the people. The request for this payment does not come from veterans alone but from farmers, wage earners, manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers, jobbers, business and professional men and women, and all others who want a wrong righted and our Nation made prosperous.

FIGHT WILL CONTINUE

We have a just cause; we are right; the fight has just commenced, and it will continue until the certificates are paid in full.

Column 1. Residence by States of all veterans holding adjusted-service certificates.

Column 2. Number of veterans in each State holding certificates.

Column 3. After deducting all prior loans, the amount remaining due veterans of each State if full-payment bill is passed by Congress.

Column 4. Total amount income-tax payers in each State will eventually contribute toward full payment if the money is raised through individual income taxes. Year 1928 used as a basis.

Column 5. Secretary Mellon, in his plea for a sales tax, disclosed that 380,000 persons in the United States pay 97 per cent of all individual income taxes. Investigation discloses that 382,121 persons pay 98.66 per cent of the total tax paid by individuals. This column shows the number of persons from each State in the class that pays 98.66 per cent.

Column 6. Residence of personal income-tax payers who have an annual income in excess of $150,000 and are in the class paying 50 per cent of the total individual income taxes.

Column 7. Full payment will average per person, or for every man, woman, and child, in the State according to the 1930 census. The approximate amount of money that will be put into circulation in any city, county, or locality may be arrived at by multiplying the population by the per capita payment for that State.

The information for columns 1, 2, and 3 of this table was compiled from information furnished by the Veterans' Administration. The other information was obtained from the statistical division of the Bureau of Internal Revenue and other governmental sources.

THE NATION WILL BE HELPED $18 PER CAPITA

If the remainder of the certificates are paid in full, it will be the same as distributing $18 per capita all over the Nation. In a city of 1,000,000 people $18,000,000 will be paid to the veterans. This money will go immediately into the channels of trade. A veteran will pay his doctor bill, drug-store account, grocery bill, an installment on the furniture, a payment on the home, or possibly enjoy additional comforts and necessities of life. All the people in that city will be helped. The benefits will not be confined to the veterans and their families.

WHAT VETERANS IN DISTRICT I REPRESENT WILL RECEIVE

If the bill to pay the certificates becomes a law, veterans residing in the counties of the district I have the honor to represent, being the first congressional district of Texas, will receive the following amounts in cash:

Bowie County	$797,404.46
Camp County	163,592.46
Cass County	493,092.60
Delta County	215,725.96
Franklin County	139,471.48
Hopkins County	482,912.20
Lamar County	796,846.18
Marion County	170,291.82
Morris County	164,659.76
Red River County	507,755.66
Titus County	262,769.26
Total	4,194,521.84

These amounts will be paid after making deductions for prior loans and interest to October 1, 1931.

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS

The Veterans of Foreign Wars, an organization composed of men who have experienced military service in time of war in foreign lands, have indorsed the proposal of full cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates. The following letter is self-explanatory:

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS,
OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., December 10, 1931.

Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PATMAN: As chairman of the committee appointed by Darold D. De Coe, commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, and as the immediate past commander in chief of that organization, may I thank you for your interest in veterans' affairs and for the introduction of the bill (H. R. 1) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States has advocated the payment of adjusted-service compensation in cash to the veterans of the World War since 1920, as is evidenced by the statement of our then legislative representative, Major Hale, which appears among the proceedings before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives during its 1920 session.

As the years have gone on our national encampments have consistently passed resolutions calling upon Congress to adjust the pay of World War veterans in cash. Even as late as the 1931 encampment, which was held in Kansas City, Mo., in September, the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States unanimously went on record as advocating the immediate cash payment of the balance due on the adjusted-service certificates.

The question involved is not a new one. Congress in its wisdom has seen fit to make cash adjustments to the railroads, war contractors, and Federal employees in amounts aggregating billions of dollars, at times when our public war debt was more than $10,000,000,000 greater than it is to-day. We believe that ours is a just and fair debt and one which, if liquidated at this time, will be of material help, not only to the three and one-half million veterans holding these certificates but to the people of the entire United States, who would derive the benefits incidental to the circulation of more than $2,000,000,000.

There should be no great difficulty in financing the payment of the balance due to these veterans since our Federal Treasury has, during the past 10 years, liquidated our public debt to the extent of $3,500,000,000 more than required by law.

It has been suggested by those opposed to the full payment of these certificates that the remaining 50 per cent due will be of great help to the veterans upon the date of maturity in 1945, or thereafter. This theory is unfounded since about two and one-half million, or 66⅔ per cent of all of the veterans to whom such certificates have been issued, have found it necessary to borrow upon them to the limit now permitted by law. They are being charged compound interest on those loans at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, with the resultant effect that upon the maturity date of the certificates those veterans who have been forced to borrow one-half of the face value of the average certificate of $1,000 will receive only $82.80, or a total of $549.80 in cash, and the Government will have deducted the remaining $450.20 as compound interest.

Therefore the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, an organization made up exclusively of men who have seen foreign service under the American flag in times of war, believe the same consideration should be shown to the men who answered the Nation's call to the service in having their adjusted compensation paid in cash as was shown to the railroads, war contractors, and Federal employees who derived great profit as the result of their service, with little or no sacrifice to themselves or their loved ones.

Respectfully yours,

PAUL C. WOLMAN,
Chairman Adjusted Compensation Committee.

HAS THE LAW AUTHORIZING LOANS OF 50 PER CENT UPON ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES CAUSED ANY PART OF THE TREASURY DEFICIT?

This charge is often made. It is not true. No part of the Treasury deficit has been caused by loans to veterans on their adjusted-service certificates. November 28, 1931, the Veterans' Administration furnished me with the latest information relative to these loans. This information discloses that a total of $1,173,330,971.37 has been loaned to veterans under both the old and new laws relating to loans; $537,339,791.76 loaned under the original act of 1924, when the debt was acknowledged; $635,891,179.61 has been loaned under the new act of 1931 authorizing a loan up to 50 per cent of the value of certificate.

None of this money has been loaned by the Treasury Department. It has all been advanced from two funds, as follows:

Adjusted-service certificate fund	$840,243,494.98
United States Government life-insurance fund	332,987,487.28

There is in the adjusted-service certificate fund at this time, after deducting the above amount, and which may be used to advance on additional loans, the sum of $153,925,720.

A letter from the Veterans' Administration to me, dated November 28, 1931, substantiates the statements I have made.

UNPATRIOTIC TO ASK FOR FULL PAYMENT

This argument is being made. By stating the argument in a different way, it answers itself. That is, the 2,500,000 needy veterans who have borrowed on their certificates the limit allowed by law are unpatriotic unless they permit the remaining half of their certificates to be consumed by compound interest. Seven hundred and fifty thousand veterans who have borrowed were out of jobs. They are still unemployed. Is it right to question their patriotism because they object to 50 per cent of their certificates being consumed by compound interest?

HAS MR. MELLON DELIBERATELY AND WILFULLY CAUSED THE DEFICIT IN THE TREASURY TO DEFEAT PAYMENTS TO VETERANS?

We know he has always opposed veteran legislation. He has made billion-dollar mistakes in estimating the condition of the Treasury at a time when his errors caused the defeat of meritorious legislation. He knows that the veterans will have a better chance to get their debt paid with a surplus in the Treasury than they would if there is a deficit. Therefore, being bitterly opposed to the payment of the adjusted-service certificates or the passage of other meritorious veteran legislation, it is reasonable to suppose that he will so maneuver and manipulate the finances of the Nation as to gain an advantage for the opposition. It has been convenient for him to so maneuver the Nation's finances.

He admitted before a Senate committee in February of this year (1931) that he has paid on the national debt during the past 10 years three and one-half billion dollars more than Congress by law said should have been paid to that time. Senator COUZENS suggested that it was a strange coincidence that three and one-half billion dollars would pay the adjusted-service certificates in full and we would not owe a penny more than Congress contemplated we should owe at that time.

The latter part of 1929 the outlook for a substantial surplus in the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year was promising. Mr. Mellon secured the passage of a law refunding to large income taxpayers $160,000,000.

The argument has been made that the payments by foreign nations to the United States on the war debt should be used to retire the adjusted certificates in cash. Mr. Mellon visited Europe this summer and we are convinced from subsequent events that he promised our foreign debtors that they would never have to pay their debts to us. This sacrifice not only destroyed the argument in favor of cash liquidation of the certificates by the use of payments by the foreign countries for that purpose but it also made a large contribution to the Treasury deficit—$247,000,000 a year—which he can use as an argument against us.

In view of these facts I believe that we are justified in saying that Mr. Mellon has deliberately and willfully created a deficit in the Treasury. He probably did not expect such a large deficit. Probably such a large deficit was not contemplated by him, but evidently he was looking forward with some degree of pleasure to a deficit.

PAY VETERANS BEFORE CONSIDERATION OF DEBT CANCELLATION

No further consideration should be given debt cancellation, reductions, or moratoriums for foreign countries until the adjusted-service certificates are paid in full. Our home people should be given first consideration. Mr. Arthur Brisbane has said:

> The best way to discourage European armaments is to make Europe pay what she owes. If she does that she will have less for big guns and poison gas. First we lent them $10,000,000,000 to complete the job of butchering each other. Now we plan to make them a present of the $10,000,000,000 if they will cut down their armaments for future butchery.

Nation	Total organized forces	Percent of population under arms
Belgium	571,494	7.1
Great Britain	565,033	1.23
Czechoslovakia	1,647,121	11.25
France	6,298,428	15.4
Greece	495,789	8.1
Italy	5,964,764	14.3
Poland	1,974,033	6.43
Rumania	1,890,612	10.68
Russia	5,167,000	3.27
Switzerland	630,090	15.8
Sweden	875,887	14.38
Jugoslavia	1,469,929	10.6
United States	427,400	.35

Every one of these countries maintains a larger armed force than the United States. If European governments are overburdened with debt, why do not they trim their military budgets? When Europe's gigantic armies are surveyed, the suggestion that the American people assume Europe's debts incurred in the last war takes on an aspect of caustic irony. The United States would default in its duty as a great world power if it should seriously consider lifting the burden of the last war from Europe's shoulders so as to make the maintenance of bigger and better armaments possible.

PAY BANKERS INSTEAD OF VETERANS

One-fifth of what the foreign nations owe us on the war debt—much of it was loaned to them after the armistice—would pay the adjusted-service certificates in full. Opposition to paying these certificates comes from the ones who want to cancel the war debts. International bankers want the United States Government to forego collecting its debt from France and England with the understanding that France and England will forego the collection of a like amount from Germany in order that Germany may pay them in full with interest. When these foreign securities were purchased by the international bankers, a discount of from 10 to 40 per cent was allowed in addition to an interest rate as high as 8 to 10 per cent.

THAW OUT FROZEN ASSETS OF THE VETERANS AS WELL AS THE BANKERS AND RESTORE PROSPERITY

Three million five hundred and eighty thousand veterans of the World War, who reside in every nook and corner of America, have frozen assets in their hands in the form of adjusted-service certificates. The bankers have frozen assets in the banks. Messrs. Mellon and Hoover are helping the banks thaw out their frozen assets. Why can not they help thaw out the frozen assets held by the veterans? Mr. Hoover claims that the country has been helped by converting one-half billion dollars worth of frozen assets of bankers into cash. Since one-half billion dollars to a few bankers has helped the country so much, let us give the people of the Nation a real chance to pay their debts, purchase necessities of life, and enjoy prosperity by paying the veterans, who reside in every community of America, five times that much money.

ALL DUE AND NO BONUS

Those certificates range in amount from $126 to $1,590 each, the average value being $1,000. The holders of those certificates reside in every nook and corner of America. The passage of the act of 1924 was by reason of agitation in the country to give to the veterans of the World War what was known as adjusted pay. The passage of the law did not give to a veteran what is commonly called a bonus certificate or a subsidy or a gratuity but it did cause to be given to him a certificate as a confession or acknowledgment of a debt for services rendered. No one can consistently say that the adjusted-service certificate represents a bonus. It does not represent a bonus.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. McGUGIN. Does not the gentleman admit that approximately 50 per cent of the face value of the bonus certificate is for interest which has not been accrued?

Mr. PATMAN. Well, I differ with the gentleman on that. I will tell the gentleman how I arrive at the value of the certificate. The veterans are not asking for any special favors. They are not asking for any special consideration. They are not asking for a penny from the Treasury of the United States that is not based upon the policy of the Government liquidating a debt, in the same manner as it has liquidated other debts.

Now, I hope to be able to yield to all gentlemen who desire to ask questions. I am not making a partisan speech. I do not expect to make a partisan statement. This question should not be in politics. I hope the day will never come when veterans' affairs will be in politics. I believe we have the side of right. I believe that we can convince the Members of this House, and we can convince the country, that 100 per cent of each and every certificate is past due.

HOW VALUE ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATE ARRIVED AT

Congress decided that each veteran of the World War was entitled to $1 a day extra pay for home service and $1.25 a day for service overseas, with the limitation that no veteran would be entitled to more than $500 for home service or more than $625 for service overseas, which is intended to cover the period of the emergency.

The average adjusted-service certificate is for $1,000. As an illustration, it may be assumed that it was arrived at as follows: The veteran was credited with 210 days' domestic service at $1 a day, $210, and 200 days' foreign service at $1.25 a day, $250, or a total of $460. The Government deducted $60 of this amount because the veteran had received an extra $60 at the time of discharge. This reduced the credit to $400. The Government instead of paying the veteran the $400 in cash added to the confession of the debt 25 per cent for deferred payment, making the credit $500 and giving the veteran what was equal to an endowment insurance policy for $1,000, dated January 1, 1925, and payable at death or January 1, 1945. It was determined that the $500 would purchase such a policy based upon the American experience table of mortality at 4 per cent.

In this settlement it will be noticed that the veteran had deducted from his credit $60 and had added to it $100, or 25 per cent, as a bonus for waiting.

Congress evidently intended to give the veterans the extra pay as of the time the services were rendered. One dollar given to them as of 1925 would be equal to giving them about 65 or 70 cents as of 1918.

If the veteran is given the $460 from a date representing halfway between the beginning and ending of his service, or June 5, 1918, the time it should be computed from, with 6 per cent compounded annually, the veteran was entitled to $1,000 October 1, 1931, or the full face value of his adjusted-service certificate. A similar computation for each certificate will cause a similar result.

In order to justify this settlement a satisfactory explanation must be given why the $60 should not be deducted, why the veteran should not accept the $100 given as a bonus for waiting, and why the veteran should receive 6 per cent interest compounded annually.

WHY THE $60 SHOULD NOT HAVE BEEN DEDUCTED

In February, 1919, Congress passed a law giving to each ex-service man $60 additional pay upon discharge, considered to be an amount sufficient to purchase a civilian suit of clothes, the soldier having given his civilian clothing to the Red Cross when he entered the service and it was sent to foreign countries to relieve distress there. The $60 was authorized to be given to all officers, including the major general, who received $8,000 a year with additional allowances, as well as the private who had served only three days in the military service. When the adjusted compensation law was passed the veterans receiving the certificates were required to account for the $60; in other words, to pay it back. The officer who drew $8,000 a year was permitted to keep his $60 and make no return to the Government, although such officer, or any other officer above the grade of captain, did not receive an adjusted-service certificate, Congress feeling that such officers were not entitled to have their pay adjusted. Neither was the private who served three days required to pay his $60 back to the Government. So why should the Government play the rôle of Indian giver to the holders of adjusted-service certificates? The $60 should not have been deducted.

WHY THE $100 OR 25 PER CENT INCREASE SHOULD NOT BE ACCEPTED

The reason is obvious. The veterans are not asking on adjusted pay for more than the full payment of their certificates. The full amount was due October 1, 1931, without accepting one penny of the 25 per cent increase allowed for waiting. By not accepting it, the payment will be for services rendered and no part of it for a bonus; the 6 per cent will be sufficient compensation for waiting.

WHY 6 PER CENT INTEREST COMPOUNDED ANNUALLY SHOULD BE ALLOWED

When the adjusted compensation act was passed in 1924, provisions were made for loans to be made to veterans on their certificates after the expiration of two years from their date. Only a small amount each year could be borrowed, never a sufficient amount to be of substantial service, and the veterans were required to pay 6, 7, and 8 per cent compounded annually for their own money.

Mr. SIMMONS. I just want to ask the gentleman a question as to a detail. The gentleman made reference to veterans who had paid the Government 6, 7, and 8 per cent compound interest on obligations. What obligation of the veterans did the Government have that carried 7 or 8 per cent?

Mr. PATMAN. They were required to pay 2 per cent above the rediscount rate in the Federal Reserve District in which they resided, and in some cases the rediscount rate, I will say to the gentleman from Nebraska, was 6 per cent, and when this was true they had to pay 8 per cent compounded annually for their money.

Mr. SIMMONS. The gentleman is satisfied there were cases where they paid 8 per cent?

Mr. PATMAN. I know I paid 7½ per cent myself, and I know there were cases of 8 per cent. I have them in my office right now.

The Government having charged the veterans from 6 to 8 per cent compounded annually certainly can not contend that it would be unfair to pay the veterans 6 per cent compounded annually. Interest charges are now 4½ compounded annually, but they have been as high as 8 per cent compounded annually.

INTEREST RECEIVED BY WAR PROFITEERS

The Secretary of the Treasury has refunded to large income-tax payers more than two thousand million, or $2,000,000,000, from the year 1922 to the year 1929, inclusive—an amount sufficient to pay the remainder of the adjusted-service certificates in full. Most of this money was refunded or given back to them on the theory that the taxpayers did not charge off a sufficient amount for depreciation in value of their properties during the war from 1917–1919. A large part of it was refunded in plain violation of the law. A large number of the beneficiaries of these large gifts were war profiteers and should have been convicted of treason for dissipating and plundering our resources during the war. When each refund was paid, the Treasury also paid the one receiving it 6 per cent interest from the year it was claimed the deduction should have been made. On one refund to the United States Steel Corporation of $15,736,595.72, interest amounting to more than $10,099,765 was paid. Mr. Mellon has made large refunds to himself and to his companies, and in each case allowed 6 per cent interest—not from 1925, the date of the adjusted-service certificates, or seven and one-half years later—but from the year he claims the credits should have been given. Those who are so loud in their denunciation of the proposal to pay the veterans this honest debt have been just as silent as the tomb while these war profiteers were wrongfully getting billions of dollars from the Treasury.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The skilled workman who was exempted from the draft and who received as high as $30 a day in the shipyards at home received his money in his pay envelope in cash at the end of each week. The soldier who fought in the trenches of France ought to have received this extra $1.25 per day at the time he fought to save the civilization of the world.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman is correct.

WHAT FULL PAYMENT MEANS

It means accepting the Government's confession of the debt of $1 and $1.25 a day extra pay as of the time the services were rendered, together with a reasonable rate of interest from that time.

COPY OF THE FULL PAYMENT BILL BY REPRESENTATIVE PATMAN, OF TEXAS

H. R. 1

A bill to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates

That title 5 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof three new sections to read as follows:

"PAYMENT OF CERTIFICATES BEFORE MATURITY

"SEC. 509. (a) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized and directed to pay to any veteran to whom an adjusted-service certificate has been issued, upon application by him and surrender of the certificate and all rights thereunder (with or without the consent of the beneficiary thereof), the amount of the face value of the certificate as computed in accordance with section 501.

"(b) No payment shall be made under this section until the certificate is in the possession of the Veterans' Administration, nor until all obligations for which the certificate was held as security have been paid or otherwise discharged.

"(c) If at the time of application to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for payment under this section the principal and interest on or in respect of any loan upon the certificate have not been paid in full by the veteran (whether or not the loan has matured), then, on request of the veteran, the administrator shall (1) pay or otherwise discharge such unpaid principal and so much of such unpaid interest (accrued or to accrue) as is necessary to make the certificate available for payment under this section, and (2) deduct from the amount of the face value of the certificate the amount of such principal and so much of such interest, if any, as accrued prior to October 1, 1931.

"(d) Upon payment under this section the certificate and all rights thereunder shall be canceled.

"(e) A veteran may receive the benefits of this section by application therefor filed with the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. Such application may be made and filed at any time before the maturity of the certificate (1) personally by the veteran or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making or filing of a personal application then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed. An application made by a person other than a representative authorized by such regulations or not filed on or before the maturity of the certificate shall be held void.

"(f) If the veteran dies after the application is made and before it is filed, it may be filed by any person. If the veteran dies after the application is made, it shall be valid if the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs finds that it bears the bona fide signature of the applicant, discloses an intention to claim the benefit of this section on behalf of the veteran, and is filed before the maturity of the certificate, whether or not the veteran is alive at the time it is filed. If death occurs after the application is made but before the negotiation of the check in payment, payment shall be made to the estate of the veteran, irrespective of any beneficiary designation, if the application is filed (1) before the death occurs, or (2) after the death occurs, but before the mailing of the check in payment to the beneficiary under section 501.

"(g) Where the records of the Veterans' Administration show that an application disclosing an intention to claim the benefits of this section has been filed before the maturity of the certificate and the application can not be found, such application shall be presumed, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, to have been valid when originally filed.

"SEC. 510. If at the time this section takes effect a veteran entitled to receive an adjusted-service certificate has not made application therefor he shall be entitled, upon application made under section 302, to receive at his option either the certificate under section 501 or payment of the amount of the face value thereof under section 509.

"SEC. 511. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, in the exercise of his powers to make regulations for payment under section 509, shall to the fullest extent practicable provide a method by which veterans may present their applications and receive payment in close proximity to the places of their residence."

SEC. 2. There is authorized to be appropriated such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the sections added to title 5 of the World War adjusted compensation act by section 1 of this act. Amounts now or hereafter in the adjusted-service certificate fund created by section 505 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, are authorized to be made available for the payment of the face value of adjusted-service certificates under section 509 or 510 of such act, as amended.

SEC. 3. This act may be cited as the "Emergency adjusted compensation act, 1932."

(The above bill was prepared by Mr. Middleton Beaman, Legislative Counsel, House of Representatives, at the request of Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas.)

VALUABLE INFORMATION ABOUT THE CERTIFICATES

The following information was obtained from the Hon. Frank T. Hines, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, October 24, 1931:

First. Number of adjusted-service certificates issued, 3,580,368.

Second. Average value of each certificate issued, $1,000.97.

Third. Average age of World War veterans, 39 years.

Fourth. Maturity value of adjusted-service certificates in force, $3,467,899,923.

Fifth. Amount of outstanding loans to veterans (principal): Made by Veterans' Administration, $1,152,936,583.41; made by banks—not redeemed (estimated), $70,000,000; total, $1,222,936,583.41.

Sixth. Number of certificates held as collateral security for loans: Held by Veterans' Administration, 2,338,040; held by banks (estimated), 175,000; total, 2,513,040.

HOW MUCH OF EACH CERTIFICATE WILL BE CONSUMED BY COMPOUND INTEREST?

A veteran of the average age, who was 33 years of age January 1, 1925, received from the Government an adjusted-service certificate for $1,000, the average value. He has borrowed on the certificate every opportunity and will continue to do so as a majority of the veterans have done. He will not repay any part of the principal or make any interest payments. The following computation furnished by the Veterans' Administration shows the amount the veteran receives in cash, the amount of compound interest charged, and other information:

Year	Loan value	Interest due beginning of year [1]	Cash to veteran
1927	$87.99		$87.99
1928	120.06	$5.27	26.80
1929	153.59	7.20	26.33
1930	188.67	9.21	25.87
1931	225.38	11.32	25.30
Emergency loan act, March, 1931	500.00		274.62

[1] Interest at maximum rate of 6 per cent to March, 1931, and maximum of 4½ per cent after March, 1931.

Year	Loan value	Interest due beginning of year	Cash to veteran
1932	$500.00	$21.00
1935	500.00	25.60
1936	500.00	26.75
1938	535.73	29.21
1940	645.06	31.90
1941	703.92	33.33
1942	765.86	34.83
1943	831.12	36.40
1944	900.00	38.04	$16.55
Jan. 1, 1945 (10 months)		33.75	66.25

It will be noticed that the veteran will receive less than $100 more on his certificate than the Government will receive in interest; or will receive $49.80 more than one-half the value of his certificate.

Only one substantial payment has been or will be made on the certificate. The other payments are in dribs and not sufficient to afford substantial relief for any purpose. After the 50 per cent loan is granted the remainder of the certificate will be practically consumed by compound interest. His next loan will be granted January 1, 1944, for $16.55. The Government does not pay compound interest for the money it borrows.

DO THE VETERANS NEED IT AND WILL THEY WASTE IT?

Let the following letter answer the question:

Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PATMAN: I have your letter of October 3, 1931, asking for certain information resulting from the study you understand the Veterans' Administration to have made concerning the direction in which the veterans spent money obtained from loans on their adjusted-service certificates.

You are advised that a general study on this matter has been made, which permits the following broad conclusions in answer to your questions:

(1) The average per cent of veterans obtaining loans for personal and family needs was 65 per cent.

(2) The per cent of veterans who used funds secured for investment purposes was 20 per cent.

(3) The per cent of veterans who used funds secured for the purchase of automobiles, purpose undetermined, was 8 per cent.

(4) The per cent of veterans who utilized funds in such a way as to receive no practical benefits therefrom was 7 per cent.

You will realize, of course, that these average percentages are estimates based upon such data as might be secured and upon such impressions as may have been gained by our managers and by those with whom our field managers came in contact. The final figures were secured by average field returns. Generally speaking, it is felt that of the 2,000,000 loans made the data fairly represents the direction in which the money was expended.

I might add that endeavor was made to determine the degree of employment among those securing loans, and from the available data secured it appears that 32 per cent of the veterans obtaining loans were unemployed and in need and utilized funds secured by borrowing on their adjusted-service certificates to meet that need.

The foregoing represents the only data which are thus far available as a result of this study.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANK T. HINES, Administrator.

The money used for investment purposes included payments on homes. Many of the veterans are paying 10 per cent interest on installment loans on their homes.

According to this report, about 750,000 of the veterans borrowing were unemployed. The number has not decreased since that time. These men are very much in need of the additional money due them to provide necessities of life for themselves and families.

WHERE DOES MONEY COME FROM TO SUPPORT NATIONAL GOVERNMENT?

The State, county, and city governments are supported principally by owners of real estate and other tangible properties. The tax is paid as much on what one owes as upon what he owns. An ambitious head of the family buys a home and makes a small payment on it. He renders it for taxation, not according to his equity but according to the value of the property. The greatest tax burdens in our Nation to-day, which are for schools, good roads, land drainage, and for support of different local and State governments, are paid largely by citizens least able to pay them. They are paid if the property is operated at a loss or if it nonrevenue bearing, whether the title holder owns it or owes for it.

No citizen or corporation pays a direct tax to the support af the National Government except in proportion to profits earned the preceding year. Except the internal-revenue tax collected on a few articles like tobacco and playing cards and the tariff duties collected at the ports, our Government is entirely supported by the income tax. The basis of the income tax is net profit.

The people who do not pay an income tax to the Government are the ones making the largest contribution to the support of schools, roads, county, city, State, and all local governments.

WHO WILL BENEFIT IF FEDERAL EXPENDITURES REDUCED

In order for the citizen who does not make sufficient profit to pay an income tax to be relieved of any tax burden by the National Government, it would be necessary for tariff duties to be lowered and the tax on tobacco reduced. Neither is hardly probable. In past years when the Government was collecting too much money the reductions were not made in the tobacco tax or tariff duties but made in income taxes—the big fellows were taken care of. We can judge the future only by the past. No increase in either of these sources of revenue is probable as they are as high now as the traffic will bear. Out of $4,000,000,000 collected by the Government annually, about $2,500,000,000 are collected from the income tax. Therefore, in order for the people who do not pay an income tax to get the benefit of a tax reduction by the National Government our expenses will have to be reduced more than $2,500,000,000 annually. That is not even possible. Our civil and miscellaneous expenses amount to a billion dollars a year, the Army and Navy $800,000,000 a year, and, besides, there are other large disbursements for the Indians, pensions, United States Veterans' Administration, postal deficiencies, and interest on the public debt.

IS PRINCIPLE OR GREED PARAMOUNT?

The campaign to reduce expenses of the National Government is a laudable one. Every board, bureau, and commission that can be dispensed with should be abolished. Every penny should be saved that can be saved. Yet, the campaign is backed by many (not all) selfish individuals who do not want to give up a fair proportion of their profits in order to help support deserving enterprises of the National Government. They talk about State rights, local self government, and how unbecoming it is for the National Government and State governments to contribute equal amounts for road building, promotion of agriculture, and other worthy undertakings. They are not trying to get you to condemn 50-50 appropriations to help you but to help them. They want to be saved the tax burden which they must pay in proportion to net profits made.

WHY SHOULD NOT THOSE WHO PROFIT SO MUCH MAKE A CONTRIBUTION TO THE NATIONAL GOVERNMENT?

Our very rich, whose net incomes are from $100,000 a year to $50,000,000 a year, receive a large part of their incomes from the following sources:

First. Patent rights.

Second. Monopolies assisted, tolerated, or granted by Government.

Third. Violations antitrust or antimonopoly laws.

Fourth. Tariff protection.

The ones enjoying tariff protection and patent monopolies are receiving substantial benefits granted and conferred by the Government. Many of them refuse to pay labor a sufficient wage, desiring to keep more of the profits for themselves. They are receiving such enormous benefits from the Government, why should they not be compelled to contribute liberally to the support of the Government? Since the Government is tolerating violations of the antitrust laws to the extent that unconscionable profits are made by the violators, certainly a portion of the profits should be taken for the Government. The holders of monopolies can not complain if a fair share of the net profits is taken for the support of the Government granting the privileges.

These classes are receiving more financial benefits from their Government than others are receiving. They constitute a special-privilege class. If the Government allows them to earn too much, they want to keep it; they are opposed to having the Government use their excess profits for the public good.

WILL INCOME TAXES BE PASSED BACK TO THE CONSUMERS?

No economist will contend that individual income taxes can be passed back to the consumers. If that were true, there would be no objection to such a tax from the taxpayers. All the earners of huge incomes are not so solicitous of the public welfare as they are their own welfare. The argument that the income tax should not be raised because it will be passed back to the people is usually colored with a strong solution of personal interest and sometimes greed. Income taxes are paid at the end of the year after the profits are made and based solely upon "net profit." Everything is taken from the consumers now that competition will permit or the traffic will bear. An increase in the income tax in the higher brackets will not cause an increase of price of any commodity.

BEWARE OF THE SALES TAX

A sales tax is intended to place the burden of the National Government on the backs of the people who pay on what they owe and not upon what they own. It is to be used to compel the poor people to pay the $10,000,000,000 that should be paid by foreign countries. The burdens of all other smaller governments are now placed largely on that class. Let those who get the most financial benefit from our National Government pay the most toward its support. Should the dollar-a-day laborer pay a tax on the food he and his family consume or the few clothes they wear or on other necessities of life as long as the holders of special privileges are accumulating and allowed to keep more than $1,000,000 a year? Five hundred thousand dollars a year?

FOREIGNERS GIVEN TEN BILLIONS TO DEPRIVE VETERANS OF TWO BILLIONS

At the last session of Congress the opposition to paying adjusted-service certificates in cash contended that the Government would have to pay as much as 4½ or 5 per cent interest for as much as $1,000,000,000 or more; they also predicted that Liberty bonds would go below par by reason of that amount of bonds being sold.

Neither prediction came true. Since that time the Government has obtained money from less than one-half of 1 per cent annual interest to 2 per cent interest. The Liberty bond market was not unduly disturbed.

Mr. Mellon has started early for this session of Congress. As chairman of the Federal Reserve Board he has caused interest rates to be increased from less than 2 per cent to 4 per cent, making his prediction come true as to interest at this session. Foreign countries are obligated to pay us more than $10,000,000,000; they are required under the agreements to pay us a substantial sum each year. They reserved the right, however, to make payments in our own bonds at par and accrued interest. Liberty bonds went slightly below par before England made her first payment in 1924. She paid us on the first payment $27.44 in cash and the remainder of $69,000,000 in our own bonds at par and accrued interest. It was good policy for England to pursue in paying this debt. United States Government bonds did not go below par any more. If they had, either of the foreign nations owing us would have quickly bought them to use in paying the debt. But Mr. Mellon made a trip to Europe this summer. Since that time European debtors of the United States have not been in the market for any more of our Liberty bonds; they have gone much below par since that time. Are we justified in saying that Mr. Mellon promised our European debtors that the war debts will be canceled? Such a conclusion is certainly logical. The French have lots of gold; they like to save money; if they thought France would have to resume payments in one year or 10 years on the war debt, don't you think they would buy our bonds at 90 which they can use for 100 cents on the dollar?

CAN MR. MELLON MAKE GOOD HIS PROMISE?

Evidently Mr. Mellon made the promise. Will he be able to deliver? He has been successful in the past. He does the thinking for a lot of people in this Nation. However, a lot of people are now doing their own thinking. The people are better informed than they have been in the recent past.

MONEY IS THE BLOOD OF THE BODY POLITIC

Since 1920 our population has increased 17,000,000 people. Our volume of money should have increased in proportion. It has not, but has decreased more than $1,000,000,000. Money has been taken out of circulation and burned. It is as reasonable to suppose that your body will remain just as efficient after the surgeon withdraws from your veins one-third of your circulating blood as to expect a nation to remain prosperous after the withdrawal of one-third of its circulating money. Money is the blood of the body politic. When there is congestion of the blood, or too little blood, in the body, there is serious trouble. When there is too much concentration of money in the hands of a few, or too little money in circulation, there is economic trouble.

HOW THE MONEY CAN BE RAISED

A few leaks stopped here and there in the Bureau of Internal Revenue, such as large refunds to Mr. Mellon, his companies, and other war profiteers, will bring in a huge sum annually. Making tax returns subject to public inspection—they are now secret—will cause an additional amount to be paid. The income tax law is weak and should be amended in relation to gifts, capital gains, and stock dividends. Such amendment will increase the amount of taxes raised enormously.

Chicago had a tax system equal to secrecy. If anyone doubts what will happen under such a system he should read about what did happen in Chicago.

Uncle Sam, blindfolded, passing around the hat, represents a secret tax system. As stated by Senator COUZENS, of Michigan, tax secrecy is a badge of fraud. We do not need a Government by secrecy. How many people would tolerate such a system in their State or local governments? Such a system holds out every inducement to a taxpayer to defraud the Government. People who defraud their Government in time of war are calculated to defraud their Government in time of peace. If we measure the amount the Government is annually being deprived of through this secret tax system by what we know some large income-tax payers defrauded our Government in time of war the amount will be tremendous; in fact, a sufficient amount to pay the certificates in full in one or two taxable years.

CONGRESS DUTY TO COIN MONEY

It is the mandatory duty of Congress under the Constitution of the United States to coin money and regulate the value thereof. Congress is not performing that duty. Mr. Mellon as chairman of the Federal Reserve Board has complete charge of our money system. He coins the money and regulates the value of it. Congress should not longer tolerate this condition.

WHERE WILL WE GET THE MONEY?

When our Nation owed $10,000,000,000 more than it owes today, or $26,000,000,000, the railroad owners, war contractors, and Federal employees were paid billions of dollars in adjusted compensation in cash. Foreign nations were also given billions of dollars; and they used our money to pay their veterans adjusted compensation in cash. Those who are opposing the payment of the adjusted-service certificates did not claim we could not pay these debts in cash, or that it would disrupt Government finances to give foreign countries billions of dollars.

These certificates can easily be paid in cash. They do not want them paid and will not try to find a way to pay them. They are so biased in favor of their own financial interests and Wall Street bankers and so prejudiced against the veterans and the plain people their opinions and predictions can not be accepted, but must be ignored.

This debt should be liquidated like all other Government obligations are liquidated. No special favors are asked, only the payment of an honest debt that Congress has heretofore confessed is due to the veterans of the World War for services rendered.

THE LEGION'S DETROIT CONVENTION ON THE BONUS

At the American Legion national convention, Detroit, Mich., Thursday, September 24, 1931, when the resolution to ask Congress to pay the remainder of the adjusted-service certificates in cash was under consideration, leaders of the opposition contended that the delegates were not bound by a majority vote from back home. The delegates to that convention were selected by the department conventions. In many instances the department conventions instructed their delegates to favor full cash payment of the certificates at the national convention. The following departments were among those so instructing their delegates: Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Texas, Arizona, District of Columbia, North Dakota, Washington, Rhode Island, Oklahoma, Indiana, Italy, Montana, Massachusetts, and California. In favor of annulling all interest, which was equal to indorsing full payment, was indorsed by the departments of Florida and New Hampshire. Only the delegates from the department of Kansas, Nebraska, and Missouri were instructed to vote against 100 per cent payment. The vote was taken on the cash-payment resolution as follows:

Alabama, 20 votes for; Alaska, 7 votes for; Arizona, 12 for; Arkansas, 1 for, 19 against; California, 18 yes, 52 no; Canada, 6 no; Colorado, 15 no; Connecticut, 20 no; Delaware, 7 no; District of Columbia, 11 yes; Florida, 18 no; France, 7 no; Georgia, 17 no; Hawaii, 8 no; Idaho, 11 no; Illinois, 93 yes; Indiana, 44 yes, 1 no; Iowa, 44 no; Italy, 7 no; Kansas, 31 no; Kentucky, 22 no; Louisiana, 15 yes; Maine, 14 no; Maryland, 12 no; Massachusetts, 29 yes, 26 no; Michigan, 22 yes, 15 no; Minnesota, 8 yes, 27 no; Mississippi, 10 yes, 8 no; Missouri, 31 no; Montana, 12 yes; New Mexico, 11 no; Habana, Cuba, 1 no; London, England, 1 no; Nebraska, 27 no; Nevada, 8 no; New Hampshire, 12 no; New Jersey, 31 no; New Mexico, passes; New York, 92 no; North Carolina, 4 yes, 21 no; North Dakota, 10 yes, 6 no; Ohio, 14 yes, 42 no; Oklahoma, 35 yes; Oregon, 18 no; Panama, 7 no; Pennsylvania, 63 yes, 17 no; Philippine Islands, 6 no; Porto Rico, 7 no; Rhode Island, 7 yes, 3 no; South Carolina, 16 no; South Dakota, 18 no; Tennessee, 31 no; Texas, 45 yes; Utah, 10 no; Vermont, 12 yes; Virginia, 17 no; Washington, 24 yes; West Virginia, 19 no; Wisconsin, 3 yes, 35 no; Wyoming, 12 no.

The vote against the cash payment was 902, and for it 507. This vote does not in any way prevent individual Legionnaires, Legion posts or departments from seeking full payment at this time. That vote was merely an expression of the delegates to the national convention on the situation as they understood it. Many Members of Congress are inclined to oppose the legislation because of the action of the American Legion convention at Detroit. I believe that 95 per cent of the Legion members want the full payment bill to pass. We must admit that the action of the Legion at Detroit must be overcome.

It will be noticed that many delegates failed to follow out their instructions.

ARE THE VETERANS TRYING TO BANKRUPT THE COUNTRY?

Are the veterans who are asking for full payment of the certificates "Treasury raiders"? Congress confessed the debt in 1924. They are only asking for its payment now because it is really due now. War contractors, railroads, and Federal employees were given several times more in adjusted compensation than the veterans, and they were not referred to as Treasury raiders.

Are the veterans trying to bankrupt the Government? If the remainder of the debt is paid in full, the amount will represent much less than 1 per cent of the total national wealth. The Nation owes $10,000,000,000 less to-day than it did 10 years ago. More than three and one-half billion dollars has been paid on the national debt in excess of what the law required should be paid at this time. This debt can be paid by diverting payments from the national debt to it until paid, and then the country will be ahead of the debt-refunding program passed by Congress. The veterans are not making unreasonable demands on Congress. If the veterans are trying to bankrupt the country by the payment of a $2,000,000,000 debt, what are they trying to do for the country when they ask that we pay a $10,000,000,000 debt for foreign countries?

Are the veterans "bonus racketeers"? They are not asking for the payment of a bonus. No bonus is involved. The question involved is pay for services rendered.

These odious terms are applied to veterans by the ones who were the most detestable slackers during the war—the war profiteers.

PROPERTY RIGHTS VERSUS HUMAN RIGHTS

The railroads, property rights, were drafted into service December 26, 1917, effective January 1, 1918. Congress immediately passed what was known as the Federal control act; the first section of that act contained this language:

The President is authorized to agree and guarantee to each carrier that during the period of such Federal control it shall receive as just compensation an annual sum, payable from time to time in reasonable installments, for each year and pro rata for any fractional year of such Federal control, not exceeding a sum equivalent as nearly as may be to its average annual railway operating income for the three years ended June 30, 1917. (Passed February 28, 1918, p. 2835, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The three years just before June 30, 1917, were the most prosperous years in the history of railroading in the United States. This act guaranteed to the railroads over a billion dollars a year actual profit.

When the war was over the railroad owners wanted a guarantee from the Government that they would make a big profit after the roads were turned back to the owners. This guarantee was given by Congress for six months, or from March 1, 1920, to September 1, 1920, which cost the Government $536,000,000, in addition to the billion dollars a year profit during Federal control. In all, the railroad owners were paid adjusted compensation amounting to $1,500,000,000.

The ex-service men, when mustered out, and without employment, did not receive any such guaranty.

Railroad owners received in cash from the Government as much as one-third the value of the entire railroad as adjusted compensation in their settlements after the war.

SEVEN BILLION BONUS TO RAILROAD OWNERS

In addition to all this, the act known as the Esch-Cummins law, which returned the roads to their owners, provided that the Interstate Commerce Commission was directed to ascertain the value of the railroads according to certain rules therein and to set rates that would give the carriers a fair return upon the valuation. This law increased the valuation of the railroads more than $7,000,000,000. If 3,500,000 war veterans who are now holders of adjusted-service certificates had received an adjusted-service credit equal to what the railroad owners received in cash and other benefits, each veteran who now holds a certificate for $1,000 would instead have a certificate for $5,000, and the veteran who holds a certificate for $1,575 would instead have a certificate for $7,875.

WAR CONTRACTORS GIVEN BILLIONS IN ADJUSTED PAY

After the war 7,000 war contractors came to the door of Congress and demanded that their pay be adjusted because the war had stopped and they were therefore not making the money they should make.

Congress passed a law adjusting the pay of these 7,000 contractors invoking the same principle that was invoked for the soldiers of adjusted pay. The Secretary of War was authorized to adjust the pay of these contractors without even a commission's investigation. In fact, many of them were paid upon reports made by dollar-a-year men who were directly interested in the industries. These industries have been paid more than $2,000,000,000 of adjusted pay by the Government. Were they asked to take a due bill or a post-dated check payable in 20 years? No; they were paid in cash, and no one suggested that the Government was not able to pay the bill, although its burden at that time was in excess by billions of dollars to what the burdens of the Government are at this time.

Secretary Mellon, who represents most of the opposition to the payment of the adjusted-service certificates, probably profited more by reason of these settlements than any other individual in the United States. Read about what an investigating committee of Congress said about some of his companies profiteering during the war.

PAY RECEIVED BY ENLISTED MEN

During the war the Canadian enlisted men were paid $33 a month, the enlisted men of New Zealand $37.50, and of Australia $45 a month.

Alien slackers and alien enemies in America made more money during the war helping to build ships and military camps than they had ever made before, and financially they were treated much better than our soldiers. One negro made $70 per day in the shipyards and also escaped military service.

The railroads were drafted into the service during the World War, but the owners were guaranteed the largest profit they had ever made in the history of railroading in America.

Property being guaranteed a handsome return, and the ship workers having received such enormous wages and escaped military service, the men who bared their breasts to enemy bullets and brought victory to our country should likewise receive a fair return for their services. Out of the $30 or $33 our soldiers received they were compelled to pay out of this sum $6 to $10 a month for insurance for the risk incident to his services in protecting the flag and conserving the wealth of his country. Soldiers were also compelled to make allotments of their pay to dependent relatives, and, in addition to this, were compelled to pay for altering and mending their own clothing and shoes and for laundry work and other incidentals. The average soldier drew $7.50 per month after making all these payments, and with that he was required to buy Liberty bonds or be called a slacker.

Every country allied with the United States during the war paid their soldiers a liberal bonus. Canada paid her soldiers from $600 to $4,500. England borrowed money from the United States and paid her own soldiers a bonus of from $280 to $4,758 each. France paid her soldiers a large bonus. The United States paid $60 to each soldier as a bonus, but required them to pay it back in arriving at the amount of adjusted-service certificates.

The whole cost of war to the United States was $36,000,000,000 and eighteen billions went to make millionaires; 23,000 millionaires were made during the war and from settlements with the Government in and immediately after the war. Thousands of men made enough money from the Government on war contracts to permit them and their families for the next five generations to live in peace and comfort and enjoy all the luxuries of this world without so much effort as the turn of the hand, while soldiers who fought in the trenches for $1.10 a day will have to work and help pay the bill.

COUZENS COMMITTEE DISCLOSES

The Bureau of Internal Revenue is under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury. In 1924–25 a committee composed of three Republicans—Senator Couzens, of Michigan, chairman; Senator Watson, of Indiana; Senator Ernst, of Kentucky—and two Democrats—Senator Jones, of New Mexico, and Senator King, of Utah—made an investigation of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The following represents some of the disclosures of that committee:

ADDITIONAL ADJUSTED PAY TO WAR CONTRACTORS

Amortizations of war facilities, which were allowed by Mr. Mellon to April 30, 1925, $596,934,813.26. Claims pending, $75,171,169.87, or a total of $672,105,983.13 (pp. 4 and 132, report Couzens committee). These companies claimed they did not deduct a sufficient amount for depreciation during the war. This was in addition to hundreds of millions of dollars received by these war contractors in adjusted pay under the bill passed in 1919.

IMPROPER ALLOWANCES

All amortization allowances exceeding $500,000 have been reviewed by the committee's staff and improper allowances in this class alone appear to amount to $210,665,360.40. (P. 4, report.)

COUZENS REPORT

All losses of the Gulf Oil Corporation, a Mellon company, due to drilling dry holes have been charged to and deducted from income as current operating expense. (317.) (P.22, report.)

PRE-WAR COMMITMENTS IGNORED

A very substantial portion of the amortization allowances has been upon facilities contracted for in 1916 but not completed and paid for until after April 6, 1917. Such facilities, having been contracted for prior to April 6, 1917, were acquired for the purpose of participating in the profits incident to the sale of materials by the Allies and were not acquired for the purposes contemplated by this act (p. 135, report).

AMORTIZATION ALLOWED WHERE OBJECT WAS TO KILL COMPETITION

(Page 137 of report)

Among refunds granted Mellon companies prior to June 1, 1921, about two million to Standard Steel and four million to Gulf Oil (page 195, report). (He has granted large refunds to himself and his companies since that time.)

MELLON ALUMINUM

This company is practically owned and controlled by A. W. Mellon and his brother.

The cost of producing aluminum can be roughly calculated with sufficient accuracy for all practical purposes to show why the Aluminum Company of America in the past 10 years has never made less than $10,000,000 per annum on a capital stock of about $18,000,000, and why the equity value of that stock is in excess of $110,000,000, all of this on an original investment of $20,000. It should be stated parenthetically that there is nothing reprehensible per se in running a $20,000 shoestring to over $110,000,000, but a company capable of this financial success is certainly not in need of protection from competition (p. 3760, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 17, 1930, quoting from RECORD of February 23, 1926).

This company not only enjoys tariff protection but operated in violation of a consent decree issued against it for violating the Sherman antitrust law (p. 3758, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 17, 1930).

The company received a large settlement for adjusted compensation on its war contracts. In addition, Mr. Mellon has granted it the following settlement since he became Secretary of the Treasury:

ALUMINUM CO.'S ADJUSTED PAY

The Aluminum Co. of America submitted its original claim for amortization, 1919, for $6,852,697.36. First supplemental claim filed December, 1921, for $18,124,339.28, and next supplemental or final claim filed April, 1923, for $18,268,435.82. (Pages 1847 and 1848, Couzens committee hearings.) Granted on claim, $15,589,614.39.

It will be noticed that the company raised its claim after Mr. Mellon became Secretary of the Treasury, March 4, 1921.

COMMITTEE OF CONGRESS MAKES INVESTIGATION OF WAR EXPENDITURES

Graham committee, being a select committee on expenditures in the War Department, House of Representatives, 1919, was composed of 10 Republicans and 5 Democrats.

A part of the committee's report will be commented upon:

[Excerpt from committee's report]

MELLON AND THE KOPPERS CO.

A by-product coke-oven program put on by one of Mr. Mellon's companies, the Koppers Co., during the war cost the Government $28,641,932.18, of which $16,737,932.18 was expended and will not be repaid. (Graham committee report, p. 63, No. 1400.) The Government received no products from any of these plants, either for war or salvage purposes.

The Koppers Co. was the owner of the patent on by-product coke ovens. A German owned 20 per cent of the stock in this company. The Alien Property Custodian seized it during the war, and it was sold to Mr. Mellon and his associates September 13, 1918, during the St. Mihiel drive in France, for $300,000, when it was reasonably worth several times that amount. It was a closed corporation and only the purchasers were in a position to know its value at the time of sale.

Mr. Mellon was a director of this company during its war activities. (Directory of Directors, Pittsburgh, Pa., 1917, 1918, and 1919.)

MELLON'S INTEREST IN SOVIET RUSSIA THROUGH KOPPERS CO.

This company has a contract in Russia at this time to construct steel mills and by-product ovens of the value of $200,000,000. The contract was made the latter part of 1930, and the company commenced immediately to send its American engineers to Russia to carry out the contract. It is known that Mr. Mellon still owns his interest in the Koppers Co. He is now Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, a country that has refused to recognize Russia.

A part of this company's activities during the war is told by the Graham investigating committee in the Jones & Laughlin Steel Co. case. Notice that the company began early to have a controlling influence in the Ordnance Department and about its own employees getting positions in this department; they drew two salaries, one from the Government and one from the Koppers Co. Notice, too, that prospective and possible profits were allowed war contractors in their settlements with the Government after the war. A part of the report is as follows:

JONES & LAUGHLIN STEEL CO.

This company had a contract, made in August, 1918, with the Government to erect 300 by-product coke ovens on the lands of the company at Pittsburgh, which were to take the place of old beehive ovens that the company had been using in its business of making steel. The Government was to take the toluol and ammonium sulphate for two years produced by these ovens and was to pay $1.50 a gallon for the toluol and $90 a ton for the ammonium sulphate. The contract estimated the production of toluol at 819,000 gallons a year and the ammonium sulphate at 24,000 tons a year. Nothing was produced, the ovens being about one-half completed when the armistice was signed.

The production of toluol was in the hands of a bureau in the Ordnance Department. The making of these contracts was opposed by experts from the Bureau of Standards and elsewhere, in the Ordnance Department, as unnecessary and improvident. However, they were made. The H. Koppers Co., a company making and building a by-product coke oven, began to have a controlling influence in this department. About the time the contract was made the following persons were employed in the department: Capt. Horace C. Porter, in charge of toluene production and distribution. He was, from 1915 to the time he entered the War Department, chemical engineer of the H. Koppers Co., and during at least part of the time he was an officer drawing a salary from the Koppers Co.

Lieut. Arthur R. Gray was the officer in charge of distribution; he, from 1915 to 1918, was purchasing engineer for the Koppers Co. Mr. H. P. Zellar, who had charge of investigations and efficiency studies of coke ovens, was, at the time of his entrance, superintendent of a by-product coke-oven company, and left the department in January, 1919, to accept a position with the Donner Union Coke Corporation, at $12,000 a year. Mr. C. J. Ramsberg was a technical expert in the toluene department; he was also vice president of the Koppers Co. He worked two days a week for the Government and four days for the Koppers people and drew a salary from both. Mr. H. B. Kirkpatrick was also a technical expert. He was an employee of the Koppers Co. and drew a salary from both the Government and the company. There was another technical expert named Engleman; he left the department to take a good position with the Birmingham Coke & By-Products Co. Of course, the Koppers ovens were used by Jones & Laughlin, and in most of the Government work.

When the contract of Jones & Laughlin was suspended the filed their claim. Early in January some claims-board men and by-product coke-oven people met in New York. They fixed a value on toluol at 17½ cents a gallon and on ammonium sulphate at $60 a ton; why, nobody knows.

At this time, on account of the armistice, the market was greatly depressed. Acting at the time of greatest depression these prices were fixed. Almost as soon as settlements were made with the producers of toluol and ammonium sulphate at these figures the prices reacted and rose. Then they settled with Jones & Laughlin, estimated their full production for two years, and gave them the difference between 17½ cents and $1.50 a gallon and $90 and $60 a ton.

In the judgment of this subcommittee, this settlement was fraudulent per se. Further reference to this general subject will be made in another report of this committee on by-product coke ovens.

(Only excerpts from committee report have been copied.)

ANOTHER MELLON COMPANY A WAR PROFITEER

Probably more scandal was connected with the Standard Steel Car Co. in its dealings with the Government during the World War than any other war-profiteering company. Mr. Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, was a director of that company. (Directory of Directors, Pittsburgh, Pa., 1917, 1918, and 1919.) In addition to his own interest in the company a large part of the stock of the Standard Steel Car Co. was owned by the Mellon National Bank and the Mellon-Stewart Construction Co. Mr. Andrew W. Mellon was president of the Mellon National Bank and a director of the Mellon-Stewart Construction Co.

The Graham investigating committee in its report on expenditures in the Ordnance Department stated the following:

As has been said, this company contracted to build nine hundred and sixty-four 9.5-inch howitzer carriages. Although the Government prepared several contracts, the company would never enter into one. The Government did not receive a single carriage that we could use prior to the armistice. The War Department spent in this venture $18,582,428.88. After the armistice the Ordnance Department had them finish 200 of these carriages. The company placed in the record a statement that the cost of production was about $23,000 each. At this rate the total cost of production was about $4,600,000. The balance of this vast sum, or about $14,000,000, was used in overhead and in building an immense plant, filled with costly machinery, all of which the contractor now has. The company was permitted to take buildings and machinery that cost $2,987,200 for $600,000, and materials that cost approximately $5,558,000 for $300,000. There was a bid for this latter material of about $700,000 from another reliable firm, which Col. E. S. Hughes, negotiating officer, concealed from his associates. The arsenals of the United States were clamoring for this raw material and machinery, but they were handed over to the contractor. There was fraud and bribery admitted by the Government agents in some of the subcontracts, but all such accounts were allowed in full.

A member of the War Claims Board at Washington wired to know if the claim had been audited. He received an answer from a member of the Chicago board to the effect that it had. The answer was false. All this time the Government accountants were protesting against the allowance of it. The company stole a carload of small tools from this plant and removed them clandestinely to their own plant. The wonderful machines which they took from the Government as junk they have since sent to their subsidiary factories for use.

Three million dollars was allowed on this claim, without an audit, by a negotiated settlement, only $800,000 of which was profit on manufactured goods, according to the contract, and the balance was for various items—"carrying charges, unabsorbed administration expenses," etc. (1678).

The subcommittee is of the opinion that the settlement of this claim constitutes a palpable fraud upon the Government and that Col. E. S. Hughes, an officer of the Regular Army, willfully violated the military code in what he did.

The Standard Steel Car Co. built a three or four story hotel, costing more than $100,000, near its steel plant at Hammond, Ind., during the war. Officers of the Government who were supervising the war contracts with this company were given free accommodations at this hotel along with the Standard Steel Car Co. officials. It was known as a club. The officers received their per diem expenses from the Government and accepted hotel accommodations free from the company. (Graham committee, series 6, vol. 2, pp. 1970–1971.)

LARGE CONTRACTS GIVEN MELLON'S STANDARD STEEL

The Standard Steel Car Co. had a number of contracts; they had this contract for the 240-millimeter carriage, and also a shell contract, and they had at the Worcester plant a contract for 155-millimeter carriages, and at the Butler plant, outside of Pittsburgh, I do not know just what they had there. They also had contracts from the Railroad Administration making cars; they had a great many contracts, they were making both passenger and freight cars. (Mr. Russell before Graham committee, 6–2, p. 1755.)

MELLON HAS A LOBBYIST IN WASHINGTON ALL DURING WAR TO LOOK AFTER HIS INTERESTS

Excerpt from testimony of Mr. Lewis J. Blakey, formerly assistant supervisor, Ordnance District Claims Board, Chicago, Ill., before Graham committee, 1919, series 6, volume 2, page 1693:

Mr. JEFFERIS. Who are the leading men of this Standard Steel Car Co.?

Mr. BLAKEY. Mr. John M. Hansen is president, and, as I understand, it is backed by the Mellons, the bankers in Pittsburgh, and the Mellon-Stewart Construction Co. is interested.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Who was this man Cory that you say went back to Washington?

Mr. BLAKEY. All I know about Cory is that he was employed all during the war and had an office here in Washington, and we called him their "political representative" here in Washington.

Further testimony disclosed that Cory and Hughes were together a great deal and had many conferences in connection with the claim of the Standard Steel Car Co. Cory is assistant to the president of the Standard Steel Car Co.

MELLON AND OTHER COPPER PROFITEERS

During the war all the companies producing copper formed a trust. One of these companies was the American Metal Co. (Graham committee ser. 6–1, p. 276.) Mr. Andrew W. Mellon was at that time a director of that company. (Directory of Directors, Pittsburgh, Pa., 1917, 1918, and 1919.) The Graham investigating committee, which filed a report of expenditures in the Ordnance Department, March 2, 1921, had this to say about the Copper Trust:

The companies who thus united in the combination that authorized the United Metals Selling Co. to act as their agent were the Anaconda Copper Mining Co. and 26 other companies.

It is in testimony that the United Metals Selling Co. under this arrangement represented practically all the copper producers in the United States.

As soon as the arrangement was made with the Government by the cooperating copper companies through the common agent, the United Metals Selling Co., four things were accomplished; first, all competition was eliminated; second, all expense of selling and finding a market was eliminated; third, the possibility of all loss from bad accounts was eliminated; fourth, the market was absolutely under the control of the American producers of copper.

Mr. Baruch, a member of the War Industries Board, appointed one Eugene Meyer, jr., as his representative, and who in turn requested all copper producers to arrange for a copper producers' committee. Mr. Meyer, at that time, had large copper investments and was heavily interested in the business.

To illustrate the profits made during this period by some of the copper companies, four instances are cited:

The Utah Copper Co. in 1917 made a profit of $32,000,000, which was 200 per cent of its capital stock, and in 1918 a profit of $24,750,000, which was 150 per cent of its capital stock. The Calumet & Hecla Mining Co. in 1917 made a profit of $9,500,000, or 800 per cent of its capital stock, and in 1918, $3,500,000, or 300 per cent of its capital stock. The Inspiration Consolidated Copper Co. in 1917 made a profit of $12,260,000, or 55 per cent of its capital stock, and in 1918, $9,250,000, or 40 per cent of its capital stock. The Kennecott Copper Co. in 1917 made a profit of $11,826,000, or 70 per cent of its capital stock, and in 1918, $9,390,135.90, or 60 per cent of its capital stock. It is probable that other companies in the list made similar profits, but the exact information is not available without a careful and detailed audit of the books of those various companies.

The profits given here are not.

SHOULD DIRECTORS OF STANDARD STEEL AND OTHER PROFITEERING COMPANIES HAVE BEEN HELD GUILTY OF TREASON?

The Graham committee was so shocked at the way the war profiteers robbed the Government during the war that it recommended on page 148 of its report No. 816, filed April 10, 1920, that the Constitution of the United States be so amended as to make such unconscionable taking of the Nation's resources in time of war be made treason. That part of the report is as follows:

Your committee respectfully recommends that an amendment to the Constitution be drawn and submitted to make profiteering in war times treason.

Article 3, section 3, of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

Modern war has been called "technical war," and we now know what such technical war means in the straining to the utmost of the resources of the Nation. What can then be more dangerous or give more "aid and comfort" to the enemy than that which seriously strikes at and impairs such resources? All profiteering does this. It is common knowledge that the profiteering during this war has been great, but what proportion of the $22,000,000,000 expended falls under the head of profiteering will probably never be known.

While hindering the Nation's war program by impairing its resources through profiteering is, to that extent, giving aid and comfort to the enemy, still it is clear that it may not be, and probably is not, coupled with such personal adherence to the enemy as is necessary to bring such conduct within the constitutional definition of treason. Your committee appreciates fully the seriousness of enlarging the constitutional definition of treason. However, it assumes to be a certainty that in every future war a strict censorship will be in force, thus practically suppressing criticism, whether honest or unwarranted. That being so, it would seem additionally necessary, as far as possible, to provide against the recurrence of those things which should be criticized. And it is the deliberate judgment of your committee that effective legislation to prevent profiteering is one such much-needed step.

Realizing, as it believes fully, the seriousness of its recommendation because of the seriousness of the need, your committee respectfully recommends that a constitutional amendment be prepared and submitted for ratification so amending the constitutional definition of treason as to include that form of unconscionable taking the Nation's resources in time of war which is commonly known as profiteering.

It suggests the following language for consideration:

That Article III, section 3, of the Constitution of the United States be amended by inserting a comma in lieu of the period at the end of the first sentence thereof, and adding the following: "or in giving them aid and comfort by injury to the military, physical, or financial resources of the United States."

PENALTY FOR TREASON

Whoever is convicted of treason shall suffer death; or, at the discretion of the court, shall be imprisoned not less than five years and fined not less than $10,000 * * *. (T. 18, pt. 1, sec. 2, Criminal Code and Criminal Procedure).

INTERNATIONAL BANKERS VERSUS VETERANS

During the past few years international bankers in New York City have loaned to Germany more than $3,000,000,000. Many of these loans bear a high rate of interest. They were also purchased from Germany in many instances at a big discount.

England and France owe the United States many billions of dollars. This money was loaned to these countries during the World War, except about two and a half billion dollars which was loaned after the signing of the armistice.

Under the agreements between the United States and these latter countries they are supposed to pay our Government more than a quarter of a billion a year. They are not asking that this amount be reduced. They are not objecting to making the payments.

However, Germany has been telling the international bankers and Wall Street that she can not pay France and England and also her obligations due to them. Therefore, some of our so-called great statesmen devised a plan for our Government that will permit England and France to fail to pay our Government the quarter billion dollars each year, with the understanding that England and France will forego the collection of a like sum from Germany, and with the further understanding that Germany will pay the Wall Street bankers.

This is nothing more nor less than the Government of the United States paying Wall Street bankers more than $3,000,000,000.

The Government of the United States owes 3,500,000 veterans of the World War a remainder of about $2,000,000,000 on their adjusted-service certificates. This is an honest debt that has been publicly confessed by the Congress of the United States for services rendered.

If France and England are required to continue to make their payments to the United States, the debt to the soldiers can be paid without the least embarrassment to the Treasury of the United States. The question occurs, Which will promote the general welfare to the greatest extent—paying Wall Street bankers a bonus of $3,000,000,000 or the veterans an honest debt of $2,000,000,000?

Three hundred million dollars paid as adjusted compensation to Government employees who drew annual salaries of $2,500 or less. This was paid during and after the war. Extra pay amounted to $20 a month, or $240 a year (p. 4882, C. R. 2/28/23).

SOLDIERS WHO WORKED ON ROADS PAID CASH

I want to call your attention to a proposition that is on all fours with this. When the war was over and the agricultural and the post office bills before the House there was a rider attached in the Senate providing that all veterans of the World War who during a certain period worked on the public roads in the United States should receive adjusted pay equal to the difference between what the Government paid them as privates or corporals or sergeants and the amount a civilian would have received under the same circumstances rendering identical service.

Here is just one illustration: Barney Allen, of Tennessee, whose military title was a corporal, received pay of $1.66½ a day, while the civilian working by his side received $8 a day—the difference being $6.33. Barney Allen received $158.23 for that month's work in adjusted pay in addition to his regular pay of $1.66½.

He worked side by side with a civilian, and this Congress said that that man is entitled to adjusted pay equal to the difference he received and what he would have received as a civilian. The amount was $6.33 a day, or $158.25 for the month. He was paid this and he did not have to wait until 1945.

I submit to you, my friends, then, when you allow the veterans for home service $1 a day and the overseas man $1.25 a day it ought to be paid as of 1918, when the services were rendered.

(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 10513, June 2, 1926.)

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman from Texas was very kind when I mentioned to him that there was a tentative understanding on the part of some of the Members that the committee would rise at 4 o'clock, and since the gentleman has not consumed the time promised I told him I was quite sure he would be recognized to-morrow.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOZIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the President's message, had come to no resolution thereon.

SOUTH CAROLINA'S NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD in regard to one phase of the agricultural crisis in South Carolina, including a brief article written and signed by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I beg one minute of the time of the House to call attention to the marvelous natural resources of the Piedmont section of South Carolina. I believe that we of that section enjoy the most equitable and uniform climate in the United States. I would say North America, except for the fact that such part of North America as is in the Torrid Zone on one side and in the Arctic Zone on the other enjoys uniformity of heat or uniformity of cold, as the case may be. But in the case of the Piedmont section, which has an average elevation of about 1,000 feet above the sea level, it is protected from the blizzards of the West and Northwest by the Blue Ridge Mountains. These mountains deflect the course of any blizzard, and shelter all of that region of South Carolina called the Piedmont section. In the summer time the Blue Ridge Mountains, on the other hand, assist in cooling the atmosphere of the Piedmont section. This is done by reason of the fact that the air at the elevation of four or five thousand feet at the top of the Blue Ridge is cool, and consequently drifts down the eastern side of the mountains to replace such part of the air of the Piedmont section that rises by reason of summer heat.

In the Greenville News, of Greenville, S. C., there appeared an editorial on December 2, 1931, under the caption "A Climate We Should Use," and I was so impressed by the simple and direct statement of the facts that I was moved to write a few words of commendation to that newspaper, and I am here appending a copy of that contribution for reproduction here. There is another important fact connected with the Piedmont section of South Carolina calculated to insure its further development and growth. This fact is the racial stock of the white people that settled and continued to control that section. They are known as Scotch-Irish people, mixed with the pure English that moved to the Piedmont section from the coastal section. Furthermore, about 75 per cent of the population of that section lying along both sides of the main line of the Southern Railroad between Charlotte, N. C., by Spartanburg, S. C., and Greenville, S. C., to Atlanta, Ga., is white. There is abundant water power originating from the water courses in streams having their sources in the Blue Ridge Mountains. This insures adequate and convenient power for all industrial purposes. The coal fields of Tennessee, Kentucky, and Virginia are not so very far away. Two-thirds of all the schools and colleges of South Carolina are located in the section mentioned. Here began the good-roads movement in our State, and here are found some of the most progressive and modern public schools and other educational systems. Notable among the school systems are those found in the Parker school district lying in the suburbs of Greenville, S. C., where are located many large textile industries. This school system is visited for inspection and instruction by teachers and students of education from all parts of the country.

I therefore feel justified in the prediction that the Piedmont section of South Carolina is destined to become the wealthiest in the great Cotton Belt, because our people can most easily readjust themselves to the necessary changes in agriculture. With a marvelous soil, highly impregnated with minerals essential to health, our people can quickly begin to produce all fruits, vegetables, and dairy products to feed not only our own urban and industrial population, but to help feed the great population of the North and East. With such a soil and such a climate and such a population, with such schools and roads, we are confidently facing the future. In a few years cotton will be only one of the many products that we will be sending to the markets. When we use all our land well, when our people are kept profitably employed all the year round with a variety of crops and products, then economic prosperity will surely smile upon us. When our farmers prosper, then our merchants will prosper, and our banks will be strong, and our professional groups will be among the beneficiaries of returning prosperity to the farmers. The textile industry will become more diversified and by reason thereof it, too, will enjoy returning prosperity. When our section has this great variety of profitable revenues, we will be secure and free from the perils that have afflicted us by reason of the 1-crop system of cotton.

Below follows the brief article to which I referred:

[Greenville News, December 2, 1931]

EDITOR THE NEWS:

Let me partly celebrate Thanksgiving Day by sending this word of commendation of your editorial November 24, headed "A Climate We Should Use." It is a blessing so common to us that we fail to appreciate it, but merely take it for granted. In my efforts to recover completely my health and strength, I have come to realize the vital importance of climate as never before. Surely the last paragraph of that editorial should be reproduced conspicuously once a week for one year to drive its simple but far-reaching truth home in the minds of our own people.

In addition, we have other natural, physical assets that we can and should use to the greatest advantage. These include pure water in great abundance and a fertile clay soil, highly impregnated with essential health-giving minerals. This insures strong and healthy men and women, but also it insures vigorous fast-growing stock, cattle, hogs, and poultry. With a soil to produce abundant feed containing the vital mineral content, milk, meat, and eggs produced in our Piedmont section should and will when properly prepared for market, bring top prices in the markets of the North and East.

SLUMP IN COTTON

For several years I have been publicly predicting this fatal and blighting slump in cotton. I am sad that my prediction proved true, but I merely declared the conviction forced on me by study, travel, and observation. I first glimpsed the coming doom of our cotton market at the British Colonial Exposition in London in 1924. I had planned and publicly announced my intention to spend this last spring and summer in going before our people and appealing to them to begin changing over from cotton to other marketable crops and products. My disappointment caused by illness begun on March 17 is very keen. Now we are even asking for legislation to compel us to curtail the planting of cotton. But we must use somehow the land released by cotton and employ somehow the time otherwise devoted to cotton. What shall we do? We are more forunate than most sections of the Cotton Belt. Our climate, in which white people can work actively all the year round—never too hot nor too cold—our soil, a fertile clay full of health-giving minerals, especially iodine—our home markets considerable with direct and quick transportation to the great centers east and north—all give us a special advantage. Grass and crops grow 250 days in each year, and our cow barns never need heating. Even now in November, in the West, where the great dairying industry thrives; even now, amid universal depression, the temperature has been 40° below zero, and is usually about zero and below from November till March. If they under such conditions can pay expenses producing cattle, milk, butter, and cheese, we ought to make a good profit. But it takes long, patient, intelligent, scientific effort. It also requires standardization. The population of our very large cities are all but begging for canned South Carolina fruits and vegetables. Our sweetpotatoes are in great demand already. Merchants proudly advertise "South Carolina sweetpotatoes" as the very best. They bring a premium in price. It would be more so with spinach, carrots, snap beans, green peas, peaches, cherries, blackberries, pears, etc. But they must be grown, gathered, and canned in a uniform, standardized manner. If we will so prepare these foods, they will sell and at the top of the market price. But they can not be sold till in existence in attractive standardized form. Why fear to begin producing and packing?

EAT OWN FOODS

People must eat, and will buy the best, certainly if prices are equal. Neighborhood canneries will cost no more than a cotton-ginning outfit. Huge canneries to serve a whole county will cost far less than a small cotton mill. So creameries and milk condenseries cost far less than small cotton mills. Bankers, merchants, professional folks, as well as farmers, are vitally interested in a prosperous agriculture and in sustaining the value of land. Why delay? Local organization, wise cooperation, and unselfish leadership will restore prosperity and finally make our Carolina Piedmont section the richest part of the South, perhaps of the whole country. It will take time and work. Not a year, nor two nor five years, but we must begin now. We must outline a general 10-year program of development, and the prosperity certain to follow will be sure, solid, and permanent. The operation will prove painful, for there is no economic anesthetic. But it will restore health and strength. With my own returning health and strength I am more resolved than ever before to do my part in this crisis. I am reenlisting in the ranks of those who will fight to free ourselves of economic enslavement and to be once more free.

Very sincerely,

J. J. McSWAIN.

P. S.—As I conclude writing I learn of the passing of Dr. Davis Furman. Truly a good and great man is gone. His very modesty and simplicity were but the badge of his genuine greatness. Worthy of his forbears—both Davis and Furman—he leaves a rich heritage of honor and example to his son.—J. J. McS.

THE RESTORATION OF THE FILIPINO FLAG

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on the Philippine question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from the Philippines?

There was no objection.

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit an address delivered by myself at the Philippine Flag Day celebration held under the auspices of the Filipino Club, Washington, D. C., October 30, 1931.

The address is as follows:

We are met on an occasion dear to the Filipino people. This day has been designated as Philippine Flag Day. Patriotic Filipinos observe it to reflect upon their country's past, consider its imperative needs, and reconsecrate themselves anew to their obligation of laboring in the domains of peace and of law to hasten the restoration of the Filipino flag as an objective symbol of a sovereign national existence.

Every people at some time or another adopts an ensign to represent a nation and its ideals. Under Spain the Filipinos were denied the use of a flag of their own creation. Emblems of different forms and designs have been used to rally the spirit of nationality among the Filipinos in the many revolutions that were fought for freedom's cause. The Filipino flag known to-day as the Sun and the Stars came into popular use during the revolution of 1896. That revolution, truly national in its scope, was the most successful. It culminated in the establishment of the short-lived Philippine Republic. Our tricolored flag then was hoisted to proclaim to the world the sovereign will of our people to transform the Philippines from a dependency into a republic, free and independent.

In 1898 the United States and Spain fought and the Philippines became involved. That war and the American-Philippine War, which immediately followed, ended the life of the Philippine Republic established at Malolos. During the early part of the American occupation the use or display of a Philippine flag, banner, or emblem was proscribed. The Philippine Commission so decreed it and violation of the law was punishable "by a fine of not less than 500 pesos ($250) nor more than 5,000 pesos ($2,500) or by imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court."

For years the Sun and the Stars, the concrete embodiment of a people's soul, was denied us. The prohibition produced national sorrow, but the people showed heroic fortitude, only biting their lips and suffering the ignominy in silence. The suppression of that adored flag which had been baptized in blood and bathed in tears accentuated the bitterness of their fate. It intensified the people's determination to restore it.

Just as after the night comes the dawn, so the years of repression were followed by a new era of good will and better understanding. The epoch of harmony and cooperation during the American régime saw the enactment of a new law which permitted the public use and display of the Philippine flag. That act provided that "the American flag shall be placed above the Filipino flag when both are in a vertical line, and to the right of the latter and at the same height when hoisted in a horizontal line." Such was a most liberal concession accorded under the most liberal period in the history of the Philippines as a dependency of the United States.

The legal requirement that the Filipino flag when publicly used may be hoisted only when accompanied by the American flag is expressive of the duality of responsibility which prevails in the present government of the Philippine Islands. Such a dual government, which parallels that which obtained among the American Colonies, is clearly unsatisfactory and foreign to the political philosophy so stubbornly defended by the American patriots of 1776. The absence of popular manifestations in the islands analogous to those which the history of the American struggle for independence records speaks of the prudence of the Filipinos and shows their faith in the validity of America's promise to set us free.

The pledge of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and grant Philippine independence has been the keynote of the harmonious relationship between the Americans and Filipinos. It has served as a guiding star to the Filipinos, and it is fortunate for both countries that the highest officials of the American Government publicly admit that the independence of the Philippines has been promised by every President and by the Congress of the United States.

The official commitment of America favoring Philippine independence furnishes a proper starting point in our common search for an immediate solution of the American-Philippine problem. Thirty years' contact has brought us to a stage when the organs of public opinion in the very Capital of this Republic make public avowal that the independence of the Philippines is one of the issues confronting American statesmanship moving rapidly toward a climax. To the Filipinos the fitting climax consists in the immediate redemption of America's pledge to free the Philippine Islands.

At this juncture it is essential and necessary that Americans and Filipinos alike be made conscious of the only condition exacted as a requisite to the grant of Philippine independence. That condition is contained in the language of a congressional enactment, "as soon as a stable government can be established." It is fortunate that on this score, too, there need be no disagreement. The term "stable government" has a definite and accepted meaning in American practice. We do not have to deal with academic theory but with stern reality. Presidents Grant and McKinley and Secretary Root, to cite no others, have set forth the essential elements.

According to precedents, a stable government is "one elected by the suffrage of the people, supported generally by the people, and is capable of maintaining order and of fulfilling international obligations." The fundamental elements of a stable government were clearly known to a Chief Executive of the United States who was a scholar in politics. President Wilson in 1920 certified to the existence of a stable government in the Philippines when, in a message to Congress that year, he made this memorable pronouncement:

"Allow me to call your attention to the fact that the people of the Philippine Islands have succeeded in maintaining a stable government since the last action of the Congress in their behalf and have thus fulfilled the condition set by the Congress as precedent to a consideration of granting independence to the islands. I respectfully submit that this condition precedent having been fulfilled it is now our liberty and our duty to keep our promise to the people of those islands by granting them the independence which they so honorably covet."

For the sake of clearness let me emphasize two cardinal points on which there should be cordial agreement:

1. That Philippine independence has been definitely promised by every American President from McKinley and by the Congress.

2. That the only condition set forth by the Government of the United States precedent upon the grant of Philippine independence is that a stable government can be established in the Philippines.

I have long maintained that the date for the grant of Philippine independence has been overdue, and I am fortified in this belief, because a Chief Magistrate of the American Republic more than 10 years ago was not only convinced that a stable government could be established in the Philippines, but that, in fact, the Filipino people had succeeded in maintaining a stable government.

In the light of these facts it would seem that the presentation of a basic requirement radically different from that enunciated in the congressional enactment of 1916 would be neither fair nor just to the people of the Philippine Islands. A departure from the requirement previously set forth, or even a modification of it, can not but reflect either instability as to fundamental policy or lack of consistency in the observance of that policy. The Filipino people have relied on the honor of the people and Government of the United States and until contrary overt acts are committed they will cling tenaciously to the belief that the sacred pledge made will not be repudiated.

The Filipino people were never told that they shall be independent only when they have established a perfect government; they have not been told that they will be independent only when they have attained the stage of invulnerability; they have not been told that they will be independent only when they will have reached such a state of prosperity that no economic ill can ever befall them. What they were told was that independence will be theirs as soon as a stable government can be established.

Let the world know that the Filipinos have weighed the consequences of their united determination to be independent. As a people we will be the ones who will suffer most should dire consequences ensue from the grant of our national independence. We are aware that economic dislocation will follow, but since independence has been promised, if economic dislocation is a necessary sequel to independence, it is plain that economic suffering has to come sometime, and we have not doubt that the Filipino people can stand the economic shock better and more easily if independence is granted immediately than if it is long delayed.

It is now alleged that a collapse would follow the withdrawal of free-trade privileges. On this point I desire to submit pertinent observations.

We should never forget that the free-trade arrangement between the United States and the Philippines was effected not at the request of the Filipinos, but solely by the will of the Americans over and above our opposition. If America is sincerely desirous to give us our freedom under the best of auspices, it is within her power so to do it. It is unstatesmanlike to utilize an economic arrangement which was imposed upon the Philippines as an excuse now to deny or delay the boon of freedom which the Filipino people consider priceless, supreme, above all earthly considerations.

We should also remember that the blame for any economic unpreparedness on the part of the Filipinos can not justly be attributed to us. It is the result of our condition of dependence which deprived us of the authority to direct our economic life. Under the present status the Filipino people have no real control of our tariff, our forests, our mines, and our public domain; they have no power to enter into commercial-treaty arrangements; they have no authority to effect arrangements or adjustments to insure their permanent stability in the economic world. We desire our freedom that we may have in our hands the instruments of our economic salvation.

The time for action has come. The desire of the Filipino people for immediate and complete independence is not really unknown to the Government and people of America. The Filipinos will be satisfied with no mere tinkering with governmental forms, or any makeshift arrangement, or any palliative, or any promise. They will be satisfied only when the independence problem is settled soon, permanently, and aright.

It pleases me beyond measure that responsible papers, groups, organizations, individuals, and entities now realize that Americans can no longer afford to dillydally with a question so important and so pressing; that inaction or delay will not help matters any; that the independence of the Philippines is a major problem in American politics which should be met squarely by the Congress; and that, in an issue involving fundamental human rights, only a statesmanlike remedy at once concrete, lasting, and definite can solve it.

An impasse has been reached in American-Filipino relations. The Filipinos have patiently met every test to which they have been submitted. America, more than the Philippines, now is on trial. What will she do with the Philippines? This is the challenge of the hour. The Filipinos await with anxiety what her action will be. Time is an essential element. The present is her golden opportunity. The precarious situation of the Philippines demands prompt and effective remedy. What the Filipinos most want has been made known clearly and unmistakably. Now more than ever they desire vehemently the immediate restoration of the Philippine flag as a symbol of their national freedom and self-sovereignty.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1931

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, who are Lord over all, Thy daily providences are our ministering angels. We thank Thee that we were fashioned by Thy fingers, animated by Thy breath, and redeemed by Thy eternal Son. Then keep us resolutely, thinking not of our losses but of our gains. In the silence of our unanswered questions, may we study our souls in the lights and the shadows of our Saviour's glory. When the performance of duty as the servants of the people is an irksome task, arm us, O God, against a compromising conscience. In a firm, vigorous resolution may we shirk no burden nor seek our own ease. Enable us always to acknowledge our allegiance to our God and to our fellow men. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AN AMERICAN CLASSIC

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a short address delivered by Hon. Edgar S. Wilson at the unveiling of the Jefferson Davis statue, and also to include a short editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have it settled now just how far we are going on inserting articles in the RECORD. Perhaps I am ignorant of the fact as to who Mr. Wilson may be, but I am not ignorant of the fact that the gentleman from Mississippi has included an editorial in his request. Now, it has been the practice of the House for some time to exclude newspaper articles, and particularly editorials, from the RECORD.

May I ask who is Mr. Wilson?

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Wilson was the authorized spokesman for the State on this occasion.

Mr. UNDERHILL. On the dedication of a statue here?

Mr. QUIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I have no objection to it, but I would like to have some intimation as to just how far the House wishes to go with reference to the RECORD. I have taken on my shoulders a very disagreeable task, which I considered a duty, for the past few years; and I propose, in spite of the change which has occurred, to carry out a policy for the protection of the Members and the RECORD. I do not want to be alone in it.

Mr. QUIN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] knows that I would not impose upon the privilege.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, no. I understand that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following short address delivered by Hon. Edgar S. Wilson at the unveiling of the Jefferson Davis statue in Statuary Hall, National Capitol, Washington, D. C., June 2, 1931:

ADDRESS OF HON. EDGAR S. WILSON

Fellow Americans, the character of Jefferson Davis is best delineated in his farewell address to Mississippians when he was the official guest of her legislature on March 10, 1884. Mr. Davis was then 76 years of age.

This speech was delivered in the hall of the house of representatives of the old capitol, in which he had twice been elected United States Senator. Pale and emaciated, Mr. Davis entered the hall leaning heavily upon the arm of Governor Lowry, followed by the supreme court judges, State officials, military, and citizens.

This speech was made 47 years ago. I had a stenographer take it down, and Mr. Davis, at my request, read and approved it. It was printed that afternoon in my paper, the New Mississippian. Its circulation was limited, the Associated Press having no agency at Jackson at that time. Later it was taken from my files and placed in State histories.

Standing erect and surveying the vast throng which he faced, having been introduced by Lieutenant Governor Shands, Mr. Davis said:

DAVIS'S FAREWELL SPEECH

"Friends and brothers of Mississippi, in the briefest terms, but with the deepest feeling, permit me to return my thanks for the unexpected honor you have conferred upon me. A waif on the political sea, I have in my secluded home by the seashore observed with intense interest all passing events affecting the interest or honor of Mississippi, and I have rejoiced to see, in the diversifications of labor and the development of our new sources of prosperity and the increased facilities of public education, reason to hope for a future to our State more prosperous than any preceding era. The safety and honor of a republic must rest upon the morality, intelligence, and patriotism of the community.

"We are now in a transition state, which is always a bad one, both in society and nature. What is to be the result of the changes which may be anticipated it is not possible to forecast, but our people have shown such fortitude and have risen so grandly from the deep depression inflicted upon them that it is fair to entertain bright hopes for the future.

"Sectional hate, concentrating itself upon my devoted head, deprives me of the privilege accorded to others in the sweeping expression of 'without distinction of race, color, or previous condition,' but it can not deprive me of that which is nearest and dearest to my heart, the right to be a Mississippian; and it is with deep gratification that I received this emphatic recognition of that right by the representatives of our people. Reared on the soil of Mississippi, the ambition of my boyhood was to do something which would redound to the honor and welfare of the State. The weight of many years admonishes me that my day for actual service has passed, yet the desire remains undiminished to see the people of Mississippi prosperous and happy and her fame not unlike the past, but gradually growing wider and brighter as years roll by.

"It has been said that I should apply for pardon. But as repentance must needs precede pardon, I have no complaint to make that pardon has not been granted to me. Remembering as I must all which has been suffered, all which has been lost, disappointed hopes and crushed aspirations, yet I deliberately say, if it were to do over again, I would again do just as I did in April, 1861. No one is the arbiter of his own fate. The people of the Confederate States did more in proportion to their numbers and means than was ever achieved by any people in the world's history. Fate decreed that they should be unsuccessful in the effort to maintain their claims to resume the grants made to the Federal Government. Our people have accepted the decree; it therefore behooves them, as they may, to promote the welfare of the Union, to show to the world that thereafter as heretofore the patriotism of our people is not measured by lines of latitude and longitude, but is as broad as the obligations they have assumed and embrace the whole of our ocean-bound domain. Let them leave to their children and children's children the grand example of never swerving from the path of duty, and preferring to return good for evil rather than to cherish the unmanly feeling of revenge. But never question or teach your children to desecrate the memory of the dead by admitting that their brothers were wrong in the effort to maintain the sovereignty, freedom, and independence which was their inalienable birthright—remembering that the coming generations are the children of the heroic mothers whose devotion to our cause in its darkest hour sustained the strong and strengthened the weak. I can not believe that the cause for which our sacrifices were made can ever be lost, but rather hope that those who now deny the justice of our asserted claims will learn from experience that the fathers builded wisely and the Constitution should be construed according to the commentaries of the men who made it.

"It having been previously understood that I would not attempt to do more than to return my thanks, which are far deeper than it would be possible for me to express, I will now, senators and representatives, and to you, ladies and gentlemen, who have honored me by your attendance, bid you an affectionate and it may be a last farewell."

While Mr. Davis was speaking I recalled his concluding words in his Rise and Fall of the Confederate States, published in 1881—prophecy then; history now:

"In asserting the right of secession, it has not been my wish to incite to its exercise. I recognize the fact that the war showed it to be impracticable, but this did not prove it to be wrong; and, now that it may not be again attempted, and that the Union may promote the general welfare, it is needful that the truth, the whole truth, should be known, so that crimination and recrimination may forever cease, and then, on the basis of fraternity and faithful regard for the rights of the States, there may be written on the arch of the Union 'Esto perpetua.'"

ROOSEVELT LAUDS DAVIS

In a speech at Vicksburg, Miss., October 21, 1907, President Theodore Roosevelt, son of Martha Bulloch, of Georgia, and Theodore Roosevelt, of New York, half southern, half northern, and all American, said:

"I am glad to be here in this historic city, this city forever memorable because of the heroic service in which victor and vanquished alike showed such splendid courage, such splendid fealty to the light as it was given to each, and before the Civil War Mississippi's sons had shown that they knew how to fight.

"It was from Vicksburg that a company came of that Mississippi regiment which won undying renown in the Mexican War under the gallant leadership of its colonel, who afterwards became the favorite son not only of Mississippi but of all the South—Jefferson Davis."

President Roosevelt, who rode through the national park with Gen. Stephen D. Lee, also said:

"And General Lee read to me that noble inspiration on the Pennsylvania monument, an inscription that should make the heart of every true American thrill:

"'Here brothers fought for principle; here heroes died for their country; and a united people will forever cherish the precious legacy of their noble manhood.'

"What other war?" asked President Roosevelt, "is there of which we can say that before the generation that fought it had died away the whole country rises to feel the same triumph alike to those who fought so valiantly for what they with equal sincerity thought to be right and lost?"

The lives of Jefferson Davis and Abraham Lincoln show a remarkable parallel. They were born 14 miles apart in Kentucky, and Davis and Lincoln Counties in Mississippi are only separated by the country of Lawrence, named for the intrepid captain who said: "Don't give up the ship."

Davis was born in 1808. Lincoln in 1809. In childhood Lincoln went to Indiana and then to Illinois. Davis came to Mississippi. Davis was a second lieutenant in the Regular Army of the Black Hawk War in 1852. Lincoln was a captain of volunteers. They began their political careers the same year, 1844. Lincoln was a presidential elector for Clay. Davis for Polk. Both served in Congress in 1845. Each was called to preside over his respective government the same year—Davis, February 6, 1861; Lincoln, March 4, 1861. Lincoln was not a Cabinet officer. Davis was Secretary of War in the Cabinet of Franklin Pierce. Lincoln was not a United States Senator. Davis was the Cicero of the Senate; and his farewell address to that body when Mississippi adopted the ordinance of secession is an American classic, as is also the Gettysburg speech of Lincoln. The Davis speech will live as long as grass grows and water runs. The Gettysburg speech of Lincoln will "live until languages are dead and lips are dust."

The bullet of a madman stilled the great heart of Abraham Lincoln; and the poisoned chalice of sectional hatred was pressed upon the lips of the prostrate South. Speaker Cannon, discussing with me the horrors and sorrows of reconstruction—when the furies of peace were worse than the terrors of war—said, "I sometimes think that when those drastic laws were passed Providence must have been asleep."

THE MEMORIES TROOPED

Jefferson Davis died in New Orleans December 6, 1889. He was temporarily interred in Metairie Cemetery, New Orleans, and buried in Hollywood Cemetery, Richmond, Va., May 31, 1893. I was named by Governor Lowry an honorary pallbearer for Mississippi at the funeral of Jefferson Davis. As the vault closed over the mortal remains of the immortal chieftain of the Confederacy—the fortunes of which my father had followed for four years, carrying a war-maimed hand to his grave—how the memories trooped.

Standing with bowed and uncovered head I saw Jefferson Davis on the sanguinary fields of Mexico. I saw Jefferson Davis write "Buena Vista" in letters of living fire on the escutcheon of our country. I read the war-tossed compass from Bull Run to Appomattox. I saw Jefferson Davis president of a "storm-cradled nation that fell." I saw Jefferson Davis in a dungeon with his frail limbs cruelly manacled and I saw the irons stricken off through the efforts of a noble-hearted Greeley. I saw Jefferson Davis as a guest of the Mississippi Legislature in 1884 in the house of representatives of the old capitol surrounded by those who had loved him and trusted him and followed him.

As I marveled at the wonderful career of this remarkable man—a "waif on the political sea," because of his undying conscientious convictions—my reverie was broken by a concord of sweet sounds. With moist eyes I located the cadence at the top of a majestic magnolia. A mocking bird was singing o'er his grave.

MR. WILSON'S ADDRESS

[From Jackson Daily News]

The address delivered by Hon. Edgar S. Wilson, Nestor of Mississippi journalism, at the unveiling of the statue of Jefferson Davis in the Hall of Fame at Washington, Tuesday afternoon, was a masterly delineation of the life and character of the great Confederate chieftain.

For more than a half century this veteran writer and publicist has watched the ebb and flow of public life in Mississippi, and is still going strong in his profession. He has intimately known more men of affairs in our Commonwealth during that period than any living person—known them only as it is possible for them to be known by a newspaperman with a keen eye and discerning judgment. It was his proud privilege to enjoy the personal friendship of Jefferson Davis during the last years of the great warrior-statesman, and his vivid description of the farewell address of Mr. Davis, delivered before the Mississippi Legislature in 1884, is a valuable contribution to the State's history. Nearly two score years ago he served as honorary pallbearer when the body of Jefferson Davis was consigned to mother earth and his beloved face forever hid from the sight of men.

It was fitting, therefore, that Mississippi's oldest journalist now in active service should have been chosen to deliver the principal address on this memorable occasion at the Capital of the Nation. Like a true newspaperman, his speech carried the merit of brevity, but what he said is worth enshrining in history.

PERMISSION TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes so that I may inform the gentleman from Massachusetts of a unanimous-consent request which I desire to prefer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The matter of foreign securities purchased in this country is receiving a great deal of attention and study just now. The New York American has conducted a very thorough survey, in which, in a series of articles, they have listed all of the securities. They have listed the securities that have been wiped out; they have listed the shrinkage. It is an informative and useful survey, and this matter will occupy four or five pages of the RECORD. I would not make this request if the information were otherwise available at this time. There is a great deal of discussion of these foreign securities, and I think it would be informative to the Members who are studying this question.

I therefore ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to print in the RECORD a series of articles on foreign securities, the result of a survey made by the New York American.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to make myself perfectly clear on this matter. I do not believe we can differentiate between the Hearst papers, the American, or the New York Times, or the Jacksonville Courier, if there is such a paper, or any other paper. Information undoubtedly will be available to members of the committee who have this matter in charge. Any Member of the House can secure the information by calling at the office of the committee. If the bars are let down in one instance, we can not be consistent and we can not be fair to the other Members who are asking for the same privilege.

The RECORD was established for a specific purpose. In recent years the privileges have been so abused, not so much by this body as by another body, that I hope the present Speaker, who has some definite idea on the subject, will embody them in some agreement or legislation whereby the RECORD may be protected.

Mr. MCFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I yield.

Mr. MCFADDEN. I may say to the gentleman that the information which the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] proposes to introduce is apparently the only available information there is on the subject. For the benefit of the gentleman from Massachusetts and the other members of the House may I say that I have been trying to get from the Federal Reserve Board, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the State Department this information, and it is not available. I think it will be beneficial to this particular subject to have this material before the House at this time.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that so far as I am concerned I have a resolution which I am going to introduce asking for a thorough investigation as to who holds these foreign securities, and so forth. Personally I see no need of hurrying it, if the gentleman wishes to expedite this matter, but I think we ought to go extremely slow and investigate it from every angle. If the administration at the other end of the Avenue wishes us to pass on this thing, does the gentleman not think we ought to have this available information for all the Members?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I think the position of the gentleman is sound. I think the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is reasonable. I think the position of the former chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. MCFADDEN] is right, but I do not wish the House to get the idea that I am playing any favorites in these objections. Personally I have no objection. It is nothing out of my pocket, but I know that the public who reads this RECORD is satiated and fed up on a lot of silly stuff and advertising that goes into the columns of the RECORD.

I will not object to this proposition.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Louisiana withhold his request for the regular order for a minute?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana has called for the regular order.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana has asked for the regular order. The regular order is: Is there objection?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to suggest to the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is familiar with the rules of the House. The gentleman from Louisiana has demanded the regular order. The regular order is: Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York to extend his remarks?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, for the present I object.

THE SOUTH'S INDUSTRIAL OUTLOOK

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a résumé of the address delivered by Dr. Julius Klein, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, before the Chamber of Commerce of Birmingham, November 4, 1931.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS BY DR. JULIUS KLEIN, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF COMMERCE

One of the outstanding features of our national economic life during these postwar years has been the truly amazing industrial advance of the Southern States. To depict adequately the impressive proportions of this achievement one need not resort to flights of oratorical fantasy; the mere recital of a few pertinent figures affords amply eloquent and vivid confirmation of this fact of the gratifying diversification of southern economic activity—the broadening out of the basis upon which the States from Virginia to Texas are building the structure of their material well-being.

Let it be noted also that this spectacular episode is not simply a cause for exhilarating laudatory comment. It goes without saying that commendation has been abundantly earned by these achievements. But they also involved truly formidable responsibilities on the part of all those in charge of the multitude of industrial enterprises entering into the composite record of accomplishment; responsibilities for far-sighted planning, which is doubly necessary as the economic order of southern communities becomes increasingly complicated; responsibilities for watchful readjustment in the important field of labor relationships which are so vital a part of any new industrial expansion.

But first let us turn to some precise measurements as to the extent of this new industrial growth in the Southern States. During that dramatic decade which culminated in the record height of 1929 the value of manufactures for the Southern States increased almost exactly 20 per cent, whereas in the rest of the country the growth was but 11.9 per cent. Indeed, the value of southern manufactures in 1929, the latest available data, exceeded $11,600,000,000, which was two and three-fourths times the total value of all southern farm and plantation products, including livestock.

One of the larger factors contributing to this development was the growth in the manufacture of cotton textiles. Whereas in the Northern States the consumption of raw cotton fell during that decade by more than 51 per cent, the consumption by the southern mills increased 31 per cent. This acceleration of cotton manufacture is, of course, to be expected, but there need be no apprehension that it might be so overstressed as to unbalance the general industrial set-up of the South. Indeed, cotton goods to-day comprise but 8 per cent of the total value of fabricated southern products. Furthermore, nearly three-quarters of those cottons are industrial lines and therefore not subject to the dangerous vagaries of style changes which have been so disastrous to textile manufacturers of wearing-apparel fabrics.

One important aspect of this industrial growth was the proximity of abundant fuel oil. The widespread exploitation of the petroleum resources of Texas and Oklahoma accounts largely for the growth in southern mineral production figures by no less than 59 per cent since 1920, as against but 16 per cent in the rest of the country.

Still another interesting index of this onward sweeping industrial advance is the figure on the increase in wage earners, which for the Southern States during the years 1919–1929 was 10 per cent, whereas for the rest of the country it was 4.7 per cent. Evidently the widespread introduction of labor-saving machinery of latest patterns and most advanced design in southern manufacturing areas has not involved any serious technological unemployment but has, on the contrary, contributed to the growth of the total factory pay rolls.

An impressive bit of evidence of this spread of new, up-to-date equipment in southern industry is the fact that whereas in the United States, exclusive of the South, the increase in electric-power production during 1920–1930 was 106 per cent, the figure below the Mason-Dixon line was no less than 191.5 per cent. This figure does not reveal a profoundly significant factor in that phenomenon, namely the spreading of industry into smaller communities as a result of the ever-widening network of electric-power lines. Comment is scarcely necessary as to the deep social significance of that trend of development away from the larger urban centers. It offers definite encouragement to the healthy diversification of productive activity in rural districts throughout the South, where overdependence on a single source of income had all too frequently resulted in a hopelessly unbalanced situation, with disastrous results whenever that lone asset became impaired for any reason.

A similar valuable contribution is being made by the spread of oil and gas pipe lines across many hitherto sparsely developed sections of the South. Thus the projection of power and fuel is laying a groundwork all over the South for substantial future industrialization in countless rural districts.

Another convincing indicator of the expanding industrial organization of the South is the growth of construction activity, which is, of course, one of the country's leading industries. The value of building contracts awarded increased about 12 per cent from 1923 to 1930 in the Southern States. During the same period the value of building contracts in all States for which data are available, excluding the Southern States, increased 8 per cent.

Equally significant, perhaps in certain respects even more so, has been the notable increase in the registration of trucks and road tractors, which has grown in the past 10 years in the South by nearly 570 per cent. This is more than double the rate for the rest of the country, for which the figure was 260 per cent. In aviation likewise the South's advance has been at a greater pace on various questions. Southern airports and landing fields have increased in number by 21.5 per cent in the past two years, as compared with 18 per cent in other States. This leadership is doubtless influenced in part by favorable climatic conditions and also by the vital geographic factor of the proximity of the important routes to the Caribbean, Mexico, and the rest of Latin America.

No industrial expansion of our time can face the future with confidence unless it is being accompanied by a thorough comprehension on the part of its leaders of the vast potentialities of the new technology in chemistry, in physics, and in all of the other lesser fields of science contributory to industrial growth.

Indeed, some of the great industrial achievements of the South in recent years stand as most impressive monuments to this new technology. Among these might be mentioned the development of rayon production, of numerous chemical products, impregnated woods, a wide range of synthetics, and many other achievements of postwar scientific advance. In this connection it is especially significant that the enrollment in southern colleges, universities, and professional schools rose during 1920–1928 by no less than 85 per cent, as compared with 73 per cent for the United States exclusive of the South. Enrollment in normal schools and teachers' colleges rose by 81 per cent during the same time in the Southern States as against less than 63 per cent elsewhere in the Nation.

No industrial growth is secure these days unless it springs from well-grounded technical training. Its future is strictly contingent upon alert vigilance on the part of factory staffs as to every new discovery in the limitless realms of scientific endeavor. Herein the South would seem to be thoroughly prepared and fully appreciative of the requirements for the future. This, of course, is particularly essential during times of drastic readjustment such as the present. The need for the fullest exploitation of the possibilities of by-products has never been more acute than it is to-day. More than one great industry in the past has owed its strength directly to the shrewd exploitation of apparently waste materials. It is doubly gratifying, therefore, to note that with the lowering of prices for such great southern staples as cotton and lumber there has been an intensified, determined campaign to broaden the markets not simply for the original commodities, but also for their many by-products—for cottonseed hulls, linters, for sawdust, insulating material, chips, and many others.

The increasing determination to diversify agriculture has brought to these new industrial plants in the South many raw materials which previously had to be sought far afield. Among these conspicuously are tung oil, skimmed milk, cellulose in various forms, and other once scorned raw materials, which the magicians of the chemical laboratory have revealed as of decided value in the development of new industrial products.

ERNEST R. ACKERMAN

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD a resolution which I offered this morning before the Committee on Appropriations and which was unanimously adopted by that committee. It is in relation to the death of the late Hon. ERNEST ACKERMAN.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The resolution adopted by the House Committee on Appropriations is as follows:

Whereas on the 18th day of October, 1931, Hon. ERNEST R. ACKERMAN, formerly a loyal and honored member of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, entered upon the life eternal: Therefore be it

Resolved, That in his decease the Nation has been deprived of a courageous and patriotic servant; his colleagues in the House of Representatives, and particularly his associates upon the Committee on Appropriations, have lost a faithful coworker and counsellor; and his friends have sustained a personal sorrow abated only by the memory of his virtues; be it further

Resolved, That the committee extend to Mrs. Ackerman their genuine and heartfelt sympathy in this bereavement; be it further Resolved, That these resolutions be made a part of the records of the committee and a copy thereof be transmitted to Mrs. Ackerman.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the President's message.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the President's message, with Mr. LOZIER in the chair.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL].

THE SWEDISH LIQUOR CONTROL SYSTEM

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on account of the economic and moral conditions of the country I decided that it was my duty as a man who understood the liquor business to go to Sweden and study what is known as the Swedish system—the Bratt system. So on July 3 I embarked on the Kungsholm and went to Goteborg, arriving there on Saturday night. I decided that the best thing for me to do was to go out to one of the principal parks, where there was a large congregation of Swedish people dining and dancing. I went there for the purpose of finding out whether by imbibing liquors they were becoming intoxicated to any degree. I found there over 300 people dining in one dining room, all of them imbibing beer and wines, and I did not see a single one intoxicated. I went from there to a dancing parlor, where there were 500 dancing and drinking beer and wine. There I saw no intoxication. Then I started up through the country of Sweden. I went as far north as Falun. Falun is the great copper city of Sweden. If one were to find drunkenness in any part of Sweden he would expect to find it there, but, to my great surprise, after staying there three days, I did not during that time find a single drunken person in the city. Then I went on down through the farming districts until I arrived at Stockholm, where I desired to study the liquor control law of that country.

The way it is handled in Sweden is this: First of all, the alcohol is made in small distilleries scattered over the country in the rural part of it. The alcohol is principally made of potatoes and barley.

There is a prohibition against molasses, grains, or potatoes from any other country coming into Sweden for that purpose, so that the farmers have the advantage of selling their products to make the alcohol of the nation. I carried on this line of study until I got into Stockholm. At Stockholm I found that all of this raw alcohol, made up through the country, was shipped there and placed in a redistilling plant and there it was made into a high-grade spirit and rectified into their national drink, called aqua vitæ, potato brandy, and Swedish punch. I went through that plant and discovered that they used the same processes in that country that before the war we used in this country. Then I studied their brewing plants. I went into a Munich brewery and there I found they make their beer of barley. They polish the barley first, and the finished product is placed in vats, where it is kept for three months, after which it is distributed. This beer is made of 3.2 per cent alcohol by weight, so it is not intoxicating. They claim that in all of their literature. They sell to the people in any quantity they want to buy it. It is sent to their homes in cases usually containing 20 short pints, and they buy that beer for 4.3 cents per bottle, or $1.07 of our money per case.

The way the hard liquors and wines are distributed is this: They have what are known as distributing stores. There are some 36 of these distributing stores scattered throughout Stockholm, and these stores are equipped like our banks. They are beautifully furnished. The way in which the people get their liquor from the stores is this: They are furnished with a mat book about the same as our bank books. They are entitled, per month, to 4 liters, which is a little more than 4 quarts, and the wife is entitled to 2 liters, making a total of 6 liters for a family. They can go to the store where they are registered and get their liquor and take it home; that is, all of the bottles at one time or one bottle if they so desire. By doing this the liquor is carried to their homes. The beer is sent direct from the brewery to the home.

The "system," as it is called, is operated under the direction of the Government, but by private capital subscribed by the Swedish people themselves. This capital can only draw 6 per cent. So any profits that accrue in the business naturally go to the treasury of the State.

The wines and liquors they buy are bought at a lower price than in any other part of the world, because the system buy in such large quantities, and the result is you can buy a bottle of wine for 75 cents in one of these stores in Sweden that would cost you one dollar and a half in Paris, and it is the same quality of wine.

The result is they have educated the Swedish people to drink wine and beer. At one time the Swedish people used 90 per cent hard liquor, but to-day they are using 40 per cent hard liquor and 60 per cent wine and beer. This has all been brought about by reason of this system.

I want to say to the Congress of the United States that from what I could see of the operation of this system, it is the best system I have ever seen, and I have been in the business for 28 years.

The hotels can sell a certain amount of hard liquor with the meals they furnish. They call it schnapps and you can go into a hotel or restaurant that has a permit and get two schnapps, which is an ounce and a quarter of hard liquor, in each glass, to be served with a hot lunch, or at night you can get three schnapps with a hot dinner.

You may ask why they do not cheat. The reason they will not cheat is because every restaurant keeper and every hotel man wants to sell his food with the schnapps, and there would be no object in giving me, for instance, two or three times the amount allowed, because if he did that he would lose the sale of two or three extra meals. If he should run out of liquor, he is entitled to go to the system and make a request for an additional amount, but any additional amount he gets he has to pay for at the same price at which he sells it. So there is absolutely no extra profit and no incentive to push the liquor business beyond what he is entitled to sell.

There is another feature that is quite interesting, and that is the system's restaurants. They have 25 restaurants in Stockholm where a man of the middle class can go in and by paying 55 cents get a good, wholesome lunch, two schnapps, and a bottle of beer. The laboring man with a cap on his head can go downstairs and get two schnapps, a bottle of beer, and a reasonable lunch for 35 cents. This has been put in operation so that the rich man will have no advantage over the poor man.

From what I could see of the system they have every chink closed up, and it is the best system in the world. It has been in operation now since 1915, and I can positively say that the law is one that does control the liquor business.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Let me conclude and then I shall yield to the gentleman.

Gentlemen, since my return home I thought it was my duty, regardless of how it might affect me politically, to bring before the Congress of the United States something that I think may possibly be passed in the Congress of the United States. I have gone the limit in studying the situation. I have studied every angle of it. There is nothing we can do on hard liquor in this country with the eighteenth amendment operative; otherwise, I would advance a bill to adopt the Bratt system. So I have taken up the one thing that they have impressed upon their own people, and that is beer. Consequently, I have introduced such a bill, and I desire now to deliver a speech that I have prepared upon that subject.

Mr. SEGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I yield.

Mr. SEGER. The gentleman made the statement that in Sweden one family was entitled to 6 liters—during what period of time?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. For one month.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I yield.

Mr. COX. The gentleman, of course, believes that the measure he advocates will have all of the beneficial effects that he states. Has not the gentleman overlooked the fact that a majority of the States have a prohibition law far more strenuous than the Federal law?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I realize that.

Mr. COX. Then those States would have to change their laws.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Not necessarily. I think there are enough States to take the 66,000,000 barrels of beer, which would give us $330,000,000.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I yield.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does not the gentleman think that he has estimated the tax too low at $5 a barrel?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I put it there because I do not believe we ought to put such a tax on it that it would be prohibitive to the poor man. You could raise it to $8. It used to be $1 and then $2.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That would make the beer cost about $12 a barrel, if you put the tax at $8.

LEGALIZATION OF MANUFACTURE OF 3.2 PER CENT BEER BY WEIGHT

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am for beer brewed from the products of the American farm. There is no industry in these United States of America suffering so greatly from continued depression as the agricultural industry of the country.

On January 16, 1920, the manufacture of the alcohol and the brewing of the beer of the Nation from grain produced by the farmers was stopped.

By closing down the distilleries, a cash market for 40,000,000 bushels of corn and small grain was destroyed. By closing the breweries, an average of 60,000,000 bushels of barley and the hops necessary to make beer was taken away from the farmers growing barley and hops. Consequently, this made a total of 100,000,000 bushels of grain per year that was not used for the purpose of the manufacture of the alcohol and beer of the country.

In consequence of the closing of the distilleries in the western part of the country, new distilleries were built on the Atlantic coast and permits were given by the prohibition enforcement office to manufacture alcohol out of blackstrap molasses imported from Cuba.

In 1914, 188,000,000 proof gallons of alcohol was made from corn. In 1929, after the closing of the western distilleries, 186,000,000 proof gallons of alcohol was made from blackstrap molasses. Consequently, the amount of gallons of alcohol has not decreased to any great extent, but the loss of the sale of 120,000,000 bushels of grain, the product of the American farm, is the result.

I believe this is a great mistake; I believe that the Congress should immediately rectify this error and give back to the farmers of the Nation this market that is rightfully theirs.

AN EFFORT TO HELP THE FARMER

I am making this effort on the floor of the House to-day in favor of what I think means more to the future prosperity of the country than any other kind of legislation that can be passed.

If we can bring about a law whereby the farmer will have an output for his products and he can sell them, he then will begin to come out of the depression that he is in at the present time. I believe that in advocating before the House of Representatives a bill for the brewing of beer I will be aiding agriculture more than by proposing any other one piece of legislation that can be passed.

In my judgment, the brewing of beer which is nonintoxicating will bring about the future sale of 120,000,000 bushels of barley per year. Take 120,000,000 bushels of barley off the market and in my judgment you will advance the average price of all grains 15 cents per bushel.

In doing this you will stimulate the farm industry; you will lighten the burdens of the farmer to the extent that he will know that he will have a cash market at least for the amount of barley that the breweries will use.

3.2 PER CENT BEER BY WEIGHT NOT INTOXICATING IN FACT

The bill that I have introduced provides for increasing the permissible alcoholic content of beer, ale, or porter to 3.2 per cent by weight, and to provide means by which all such beer, ale, or porter shall be made of products of American farms.

It is my contention that a beer containing 3.2 per cent alcohol by weight is not intoxicating in fact; it is the same beer that is brewed in Sweden and Scandinavian countries, and all of their literature contends that it is nonintoxicating liquor.

Proofs have been made by scientists and by those in authority that an adult can not be intoxicated by the drinking of beer of an alcoholic content of 3.2 per cent by weight, because the stomach will not hold enough beer to bring about intoxication in fact.

In order to make this proof conclusive in my own mind—and I am not a drinking man—I went to the Muchin brewery in Stockholm at 9 o'clock in the morning, before taking any liquid or substance in my stomach, and drank 4 pints of this beer, under the supervision of a doctor and a chemist.

It did not affect me mentally or physically, and there were no bad effects. So I can honestly come before the Congress of the United States and make an affidavit that it is my judgment that beer containing 3.2 per cent alcohol by weight will not intoxicate.

I have previously stated upon the floor of this House that 3 per cent beer was the same as dissolving 3 gallons of alcohol in 97 gallons of water; but I now find that medicinal research has determined that beer has still another advantage over this argument. An extract from Mellanby's article in Medical Research, 1919, shows an experiment in which whisky was diluted down to the strength of stout or ale so that each contained 5.5 per cent alcohol by volume, and there was found a considerable difference between the rate of absorption of alcohol into the blood stream in the two cases.

In the case of diluted whisky, the maximum concentration was reached in one and one-fourth hours after the experiment was started.

In the case of stout the maximum was reached only after two hours.

The conclusion was that the stout contained something which tended to delay absorption, and hence had a less intoxicating effect than diluted whisky of the same alcoholic content, which was absorbed by the blood stream more rapidly. I contend that this is a conclusive reason why we need not fear to accept the brewing of beer with an alcoholic content of 3.2 per cent by weight, as it will not intoxicate.

CANADIAN BEER

There is some discussion that Canadian beer is much stronger in alcoholic content than American beer. In order that you may thoroughly understand the difference in measuring proof spirits from the English system and the American system, it is as follows:

Four per cent proof spirits by measure under the English system equal 1.82 per cent by weight or 2.29 per cent by volume, our system. Hence Canadian beer, sometimes mentioned as containing 9 per cent proof spirits, in reality measures about 5 per cent by volume under our system of calculation.

I give you that explanation so that you may benefit and not be deceived by misstatements that may come to you.

A great many Congressmen and the public at large will be confused, I am sure, by the fact that I am introducing this bill on a basis of weight instead of volume to determine the alcoholic content of beer. A great many will say that it does not contain enough alcohol to suit the taste of the American consumer, but, my colleagues, so that you will not be deceived and the public may not be deceived, by my introduction of the alcohol content of beer by weight, I want to quote you these figures, so that there can be no misunderstanding in reference to it, and I believe this is the proper way to write the bill so that there can be no discrimination or any misunderstanding in the qualifications as to the alcoholic content. I quote the alcohol in beer by weight and volume so that it will be perfectly plain:

2.75 per cent by weight equals 3.46 per cent by volume.
3 per cent by weight equals 3.78 per cent by volume.
3.25 per cent by weight equals 4.09 per cent by volume.
3.50 per cent by weight equals 4.41 per cent by volume.

HOW IT IS COMPUTED

To change from weight to volume, multiply by 1.26 or divide by 0.7936.

To change from volume into weight, multiply by 0.7936 or divide by 1.26.

3.2 per cent by weight is equal to 4 per cent by volume.

In order that you will also understand the average alcoholic content in pre-war American beer, which averaged from 3.5 per cent to 4 per cent of alcohol, I quote as follows:

German beers range from 2 per cent to 4 per cent alcohol by volume, British ales from 2 per cent to 8 per cent alcohol by volume. It is well understood by the brewers that 4 per cent beer by volume is high enough in alcoholic content and should not go beyond that amount.

The reason that I make this explanation is because a great many misquotations are made as to the alcoholic content of beer made previous to the war being 7 per cent, 8 per cent, or 9 per cent alcohol by volume. The highest alcoholic content of beer of any kind is contained in the imported beers from Germany and England, which average about 5 per cent by volume, and the only reason that they are made at 5 per cent by volume is because alcohol acts as a preservative in heavy British ales and in heavy German beers and makes it necessary on account of the lack of refrigeration in those countries to keep the alcoholic content to this point.

ORIGIN AND GROWTH OF LAGER BEER

It might be interesting to the Congress of the United States to know that since the Civil War this country has made progress toward temperance. This is best shown by the records of the Department of the Internal Revenue. The department in its present form dates back to the beginning of the Civil War. From its record we glean that in 1860 the per capita consumption of distilled spirits was 2.86 gallons. The rapid growth of the brewing industry began at the time of the Civil War and, due to it, the use of mild fermented beverages gradually replaced whisky and caused a steady decline in its consumption, so that in 1896 it reached its lowest mark, 1 gallon per capita.

This shows conclusively that in 1860 nearly three times as much whisky was used per capita as in 1896. This great difference was not due to prohibition, for during this period no State except Kansas joined Maine in its prohibition policy, and but few localities in those years were under local or county option.

The decline of the consumption of whisky during this period was entirely caused by the gradual displacement of hard liquor by mild malt beverages.

As far back as 1848 lager beer in this country was brewed by the American brewers, and with the development of pasteurization and refrigeration it was possible for them to turn out a light sparkling lager with a fine hop flavor. This soon became so popular that the ale trade of the United States shrank into insignificance, and by 1914 the lager-beer brewers had captured 98 per cent of the malt-beverage business. It was their aim, and is now, to produce an alcoholic beverage with the lowest alcoholic content without impairing its wholesome and palatable qualities.

No brewer in this country desires to make a beer that will intoxicate, but there must be enough alcohol left in the beer to make it satisfactory to the consumer and to retain the qualities of a good wholesome food and beverage, and it is my contention that if you will enact into law the bill that I have introduced, this march toward practical temperance will go on and the people of the United States will be satisfied with a good, clean malt beverage instead of poisonous bootleg intoxicating liquors of all descriptions.

REVENUE

From an economic standpoint, a tax levy of $5 on each barrel of beer, figuring on a basis of the amount of beer brewed in 1914, 66,000,000 barrels, would amount to a total of $330,000,000. Based on this estimate, this would provide $330,000,000 toward the deficit of the United States Government for the year 1931. I know of no other way where a tax could be so evenly distributed over the country or made with better consideration than a tax on beer.

TAKES THE PROFIT OUT OF THE BOOTLEGGING BUSINESS

The prohibition law went into effect in the United States January 16, 1920. Previous to that time the manufacture of spirits, wine, and beer was under Government control. Since the prohibition law went into effect all of these Government agencies, which are law-abiding, have been dispensed with, and the process of distillation and brewing have been carried on surreptitiously by criminals and the worst element of citizenship that we have in these United States.

It has been an easy matter for them to make a product that would intoxicate, to hide it away, to sell it, without the Government's permission, and this has done much to corrupt the moral fiber of our citizens.

The great difficulty to-day in enforcing the Volstead Act is the profit gained by the bootlegger by manufacturing a gallon of alcohol for 25 cents out of corn sugar without any expensive distilling apparatus and selling it for $6 a gallon, or in manufacturing beer for $3.50 a barrel and selling it for $55 a barrel. This makes the business so profitable that most any man out of work is willing to take a chance.

If the Congress of the United States will pass a law under which beer can be made containing 3.2 per cent alcohol by weight, you will take the profit out of the bootlegger's business and destroy him, and in no other manner can you possibly discontinue his activities.

I am familiar with the liquor business; I know its iniquities. I also know that this is a business that meets a popular demand and one that can be easily sold to the public, and therefore I can see no other conclusion that this country can come to eventually other than to handle this business in a legal and practical way. I contend that this is the best way to start by allowing the public the privilege of buying a mild, wholesome, fermented beverage. If this is done it will eliminate the sale of spurious alcohol to a large extent; it will give an opportunity for those who desire to indulge in a mild beverage at meals to acquire a beer for a beverage rather than alcohol reduced with water and flavored.

I contend that this country now is saturated with a beverage that is intoxicating, but by adopting this measure, which, of course, is an experiment, you will pave the way for future legislation that may bring about sobriety in the country.

PROTECTION FOR THE STATES

You will notice that I have introduced a companion bill to this bill, amending the Webb-Kenyon Act to prescribe the alcoholic content of liquors divested of their interstate character under such act. The title of the bill reads as follows:

A bill to fix the alcoholic content of liquors included within the Webb-Kenyon Act so that liquors may not be brought into a State in violation of the State policy on prohibition, even though Congress has not prohibited the manufacture, sale, or transportation of such liquors elsewhere.

My object in introducing this bill is to protect any State in the Union that does not desire beer with an alcoholic content of more than one-half of 1 per cent to be sold in the respective Territory or State. They will, under this law, be fully protected; and if they want beer of 3.2 per cent sold within the borders of their State, it will be necessary for them to pass legislation allowing the same. In this way those States that do not desire beer to be sold within their borders can easily prevent it, so far as the law is concerned.

It is my honest and sincere belief that this bill will in no way conflict with the eighteenth amendment, which prohibits the sale and manufacture of intoxicating beverages.

My colleagues, let us once in the history of Congress set aside politics and the wet and dry question; let us come out in the open and herald to the country that we are willing to pass a law that can be enforced.

Three and two-tenths per cent alcohol by weight in beer is not intoxicating and should be sold to the public instead of coercing them into buying improper alcoholic beverages. Anybody who has ever hoped for the success of prohibition should certainly indorse an honest measure aimed at making the law conform to the eighteenth amendment and at the same time benefit law enforcement as a whole. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, for 12 years I have advocated the good qualities in the wholesome glass of beer that my colleague from Illinois, who has preceded me, said he obtained on his travels in Europe. Of course, I know that if he had visited the city of Pilsen and tasted some of that good Bohemian Pilsener he would have been still more desirous of immediate action for the repeal of the Volstead Act and the adoption of his bill.

I wish to congratulate the House and the country on the information that he has given, and which I hope will be helpful and beneficial to those Members who have been deprived of that information heretofore.

I always believed that if my colleagues had properly informed themselves and had listened to the convincing arguments made and to the uncontrovertible evidence which has been presented against prohibition from time to time, and had not been blinded by prejudice, they would not have voted against me and against the modification of the Volstead Act and the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. And if the gentleman and other Members had listened to me before, we would not be obliged to make up the $2,000,000,000 deficit, for the revenue from the manufacture and sale of beer would net at least $500,000,000 annually. Neither would there be the widespread unemployment that now exists throughout the country, since the legalization of the manufacture and sale of beer would give employment to a half-million people.

Long before the gentleman from Illinois went to Europe I introduced a bill and secured hearings before the Judiciary Committee on my Resolution No. 99, which provided for the amendment of the Constitution giving to the Congress the right to legislate on this subject and giving to the respective States the right and privilege which had been taken away from them by the eighteenth amendment.

Now, I have studied the question for many years, and I am thankful that my colleague has so ably and forcibly brought to the attention of the people the benefits which would accrue to the farmers of this country by the repeal of the prohibition law.

My colleague from Illinois has pointed out that about 60,000,000 bushels of wheat and barley had been used in the manufacture of beer and about 40,000,000 bushels in the manufacture of alcohol, and that the honest profit on this produce has been taken away from the farmers by the eighteenth amendment.

My colleague has also pointed out that the same amount of alcohol is being manufactured under the prohibition law as was formerly, but it is now being manufactured from "blackstrap," imported from Cuba, instead of from corn grown in Illinois and the Middle West.

May I not ask my colleagues and Republican Members why it is that they have permitted the importation of "blackstrap" at the expense and ruination of the American farmers. I realize that they may be reluctant to give the true reason. I, myself, am of the opinion that it is because the sugar interests, who are such stanch friends of the Republicans, have contributed to the election fund of the Republican Senators and to the Republican Party.

The trouble with the farmers, in whom my colleague is so especially interested, is that they have been blind to their interests for many years. Notwithstanding the unfriendliness of the Republican administrations of Presidents Coolidge and Hoover, they will support the Republican Party, even though they should have known that that party was not sincere and was not a friend of the agricultural interests and the farmers of this country. I am satisfied that all that has been said by my colleague in relation to the resumption of manufacture of this wholesome beverage is true. Therefore I am ready and willing, as I have been for many years, to advocate the modification, yes, the repeal of this law. And for that reason I am immensely pleased that my colleague has finally seen the light of day, and has recognized, after these many years, that I was justified in my demand for the repeal of the prohibition law. I hope that there will be many others who will follow him and join with us in our efforts to bring to the American people the relief privileges so long denied them.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him to ask that the committee rise temporarily?

Mr. SABATH. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise for a few moments.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOZIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the President's message and had come to no resolution thereon.

UNIVERSITY OF ALABAMA FOOTBALL TEAM

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, when one receives the highest honors that can be won in any honorable field of human endeavor, where nation-wide competition obtains, it represents an outstanding achievement. We have with us to-day a group of young men from the University of Alabama who have measured up to that standard, and I feel that no one can so appropriately present them to the House as my friend and colleague, who is an alumnus of the university and who won his "A" letter and really was one of the founders at the university of the national game which these boys have so well carried on. Therefore I yield to the Hon. WILLIAM BANKHEAD, who will introduce these fellow alumni of ours to the House. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, as an alumnus of the University of Alabama I am naturally proud, not only of the cultural and scholastic accomplishments of that institution, which last June celebrated its one hundredth anniversary, but within recent years I am particularly proud to note the fact that in the field of athletic endeavor the football teams of the University of Alabama have achieved national reputation. Twice national champions within recent years, only last year the team of 1930 was universally recognized as the best football team in America.

To-morrow, at Griffith Stadium, this famous team of athletes will gratuitously give their time and services, without any claim upon the proceeds, in a contest with teams made up of students from three of the colleges of the District of Columbia, for the purpose of creating a charity fund for the destitute of the District of Columbia. On behalf of the management of that contest, and upon the part of all the alumni of the University of Alabama, in Congress and outside, we extend to the Members of the House an invitation to attend that rather unique contest.

It now gives me great pleasure as a former member of the team, many years ago, as one who is naturally proud of its athletic achievements, to present to you as representatives of athletic prowess of the State of Alabama, by the courtesy of the House, the University of Alabama football team of the year 1930. [Applause.]

NATIONAL FOREST RESERVATION COMMISSION

The SPEAKER. Under the provisions of the act of March 1, 1911 (title 16, sec. 513, U. S. Code), the Chair appoints the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DOXEY] to fill the vacancy on the National Forest Reservation Commission caused by the death of Hon. James B. Aswell.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the President's message.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the President's message, with Mr. LOZIER in the chair.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, at this time, we, the liberals, are indeed fortunate, because the Democratic Party, now in control, believing in fair play, has liberalized the rules of the House so that we who have for years, under a Republican majority, tried in every way possible to secure a direct vote on this question, so important to the farmers and the country, will have that privilege. Of course, it is to be regretted that we still have in the White House a man controlled by a certain element, which has such great influence over him that I doubt very much whether the Anti-Saloon League would permit him to sign or approve any modification of the prohibition law. But I know this, that within a short space of time the election will take place, and the people of America will speak, and when that election is over, I am satisfied we will have in this House a splendid majority of broad-minded, liberal men, and in the White House a Democrat; a man who will be unrestrained, uncontrolled by anyone, and who, in his desire to serve the Nation and a majority of the people, will sign such a bill, as I hope and expect we will pass, and thus relieve the Nation of the infamous prohibition law and the crime-breeding Volstead Act, which have been a curse to the people.

Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to speak on this subject, but I could not refrain from taking advantage of the opportunity presented to me by my colleague's speech.

I know that a majority of the Members, or at least the older Members, expect me to make a speech on a measure of still greater importance at this moment, namely, on my efforts to stop the short selling or the racketeering going on on the stock exchanges in the United States. I shall be obliged to withhold my speech upon that subject for a few days, but I assure you I shall be able to present to the House enough evidence to entitle me to secure immediate action upon my resolution and bill to put an end to that racket, which this Nation has tolerated and which more than any other cause is responsible for the unfortunate and deplorable condition from which the Nation is now suffering. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STOKES].

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, in passing a statue of Burke on one of your avenues I noticed he had stated that magnanimity in politics is true wisdom. Let us follow the advice of one who was our good friend.

On June 20, 1931, President Hoover, after consultation with various Members of Congress, announced that the United States, subject to the approval of Congress, would allow a debt holiday of one year to all debtor nations, provided the other creditor nations would do likewise. This, of course, did not apply to securities held by the general public known as private debts but to interallied debts.

This announcement was followed by a brisk rise in the value of all securities and commodities, showing that the country generally approved this action.

All of the nations' representatives—32 allied and associated powers—met together in London in July and accepted in principle the arrangement subject to working out details.

The conference of London suggested, however, that a committee of expert economists and financiers be appointed, one from each of the 32 allied and associated powers and one from Germany, to offer recommendations to cure the world-wide business depression.

In due time this committee was formed. Mr. Wiggin, of New York, represented the United States. They met in August of this year at the Bank for International Settlements at Basel and, after several weeks of study, made the following recommendations:

First. Friendly cooperation between Germany and France.

Second. Reduced reparations.

Third. Reduced interallied debts.

Fourth. Reduced tariffs.

Since the treaty of Versailles and its successor, the so-called Dawes plan, and its later modification known as the Young plan, Germany has already paid in reparations about $5,000,000,000, which includes payments in gold, in kind, and in property, as announced by Chancellor Snowden before Parliament in July. In order to provide funds for these payments she has borrowed somewhat over $7,000,000,000, about five billion in long-term and roughly two billion in short-term loans.

Instead of keeping these short credits in liquid investments she placed them in permanent improvements, which in good times would probably have been profitable, but under present depressed conditions have become frozen assets. At the present time she can not borrow any money, because her credit is gone, so she must depend on what national income remains and on selling her inventories.

Mr. Houghton, the recent United States ambassador to Germany, said:

> I can not think of anything more unfortunate for the world than the collapse of Germany at the present time, and unless help is extended such a collapse is not impossible nor far away.

Beyond Germany is Russia, and in Russia is tyranny and despotism. If Germany is thrown into the condition of Russia, the result may be very serious.

I agree with the opinion that a debt holiday of one year as is now suggested will restore business conditions to normal much more rapidly than otherwise and that our profit from the resultant good times will far exceed our interest payments on foreign debts. German prosperity is closely allied with world prosperity.

This summer in France I was told that Chancellor Bruening is a loyal and intelligent man and believes he has a religious mission to fulfill. His prestige has recently increased with his responsibility. He is endeavoring to teach his people national self-discipline—a good thing for any nation.

God has made all nations of one blood. Let us do our share toward keeping the solemn promise Mr. Hoover has made in our name to the world.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOKES. I yield.

Mr. FISH. I just wanted to ask where the gentleman got his figure of $7,000,000,000.

Mr. STOKES. I may be wrong about that figure. I took that from newspaper clippings and that figure may be a little lower than it should be. It is approximately $7,000,000,000, and approximately two billion of short-term credits.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, our Republican friends across the aisle can not understand the workings of a political party that will recognize the inherent rights of and permit its obscure and humble members to speak their sentiments at will the same as it does its leaders. They imagine that in the opening of Congress every Member who appears upon the floor has been specially selected by the Democratic organization to speak for the party. They are so accustomed to holding back their ordinary Members and putting up only certain leaders that it irks them for their rule to be disregarded across the aisle.

It has been charged, but irresponsibly so, that we on this side are not at work, because no appropriation bills have yet been presented, carrying hundreds of millions of dollars, as has been the usual Republican custom. I call the attention of our minority friends to the fact that they have not yet appointed a single working committee. They have selected only their members of the Appropriations Committee and of the Ways and Means Committee. Not a single legislative committee has had its personnel selected by the minority party up to this time.

Only day before yesterday the President of the United States presented to this House for the first time his Budget of 727 printed pages, each as large as those of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, proposing to appropriate of the people's tax money for the next fiscal year $3,997,000,000, and our Republican friends would expect that we would come in already with the administration's appropriation bill, appropriating $4,000,000,000 in lump sums, carrying out the ideas of the President's Budget, regardless of everything.

I say to our friends that from now on there will be a few of us Members of Congress who are going to give careful study and consideration to every single item in this Budget before the appropriation bills are framed and brought in here for passage.

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment I will be glad to yield.

They speak about loyalty to the President. You Republicans were loyal to the President during the war, but what happened just after the armistice? If I were going to take a subject for my few minutes' address this morning, it would be that passage of Scripture, "Whatsoever ye shall sow, that shall ye also reap."

I can not forget that immediately after the signing of the armistice those of you Republicans who were then in the Congress rose from that side of the aisle one after another in a merciless attack upon the President and his administration. I can not forget that you criticized his physical infirmities, when his giant mind and judgment were stronger than ever. You will not find a Democrat who will criticize the physical strength of your present President, because he has a splendid, strong physique. [Laughter.]

I can not forget the "Graham of Illinois committee," the smelling committee, if you please, created by you Republicans, that wasted $157,000 from the people's Treasury in an attempt to criticize and hamstring and hog-tie the President of the United States. I can not forget the "Joe Walsh of Massachusetts committee," the smelling committee you Republicans created that went in its palatial Pullman train to the Pacific coast and spent $43,900 of the people's money trying to hamstring the President of the United States.

> Whatsoever ye shall sow, that shall ye also reap.

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I will; because I am sure my friend from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] will grant me more time, because he is so generous to the country that when your Republican leaders will not allow a distinguished Republican Member like the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], one of the hardest working men in the House, one of the most diligent, one who is patriotic and conscientious, who was a distinguished member of your Committee on Appropriations as far back as 1921—I say when you Republicans will not allow him to speak, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] grants STAFFORD a little time to speak his sentiments. [Applause and laughter.]

I yield.

Mr. LUCE. Did I understand the gentleman to reproach the Republicans of the House for not having yet named their committees?

Mr. BLANTON. No. I was just answering your attempted reproach of our side about committees not yet working.

Mr. LUCE. Is it customary for the minority to announce their committees before the majority have announced theirs?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I will get to that in just a minute.

Mr. LUCE. That is a fair question.

Mr. BLANTON. I will answer it in just a moment.

Mr. LUCE. Answer it now.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to answer it now, but I always like to have the floor when I am answering. The gentleman is right.

Mr. LUCE. Of course, he is. He is always right.

Mr. BLANTON. But I want to say to him that the time for naming all committees has not properly arrived. The gentleman has been a distinguished parliamentarian of his State as well as of the Nation. He has presided over a deliberative body there with great dignity and honor, and he knows there is an orderly process to be followed rather than a disorderly one. We are following the orderly process. We are going to take your President's 727-page Budget appropriating $3,997,000,000 and study it and analyze it and investigate it before we bring in a half-baked bill for 435 Members of Congress to swallow without changing the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." That has been the Republican practice, to have one prepared before committees are named.

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman kindly answer my question?

Mr. BLANTON. I told the gentleman that it was usual for the Republicans to bring in your committees when we brought in ours.

Mr. LUCE. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. But we have not seen fit yet to bring in ours. [Laughter.]

We have not brought in ours yet, because we are trying to select the men best fitted for the different kinds of places. I want to say that while you have had three distinguished Republican Presidents serving under one distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, it has been my privilege in the House of Representatives to have served under six distinguished chairmen of the Committee on Appropriations. I have not been on that committee until recently, but I have nevertheless served under them. I can remember what our Mr. John J. Fitzgerald, of New York, a Democrat, who was chairman of the Appropriations Committee when I began serving—I can remember what he said about economy in appropriations and against lump-sum items. I can remember what Mr. Swagar Sherley, another Democrat, of Kentucky, said about it. I can remember what James W. Good said about it. It was his opinion that lump-sum appropriations would ruin the Government. I can remember what Martin B. Madden said about it. He was one of your greatest Republicans. I can remember what that distinguished and beloved colleague of ours, Dan Anthony, said about it. He was another stalwart Republican. And I remember what our friend Mr. WILL WOOD, your retiring Republican chairman, said about it, and I know and we all know what our friend JOE BYRNS thinks about it. But lump-sum appropriations have nevertheless been your Republican slogan here for 10 years.

Your President talks about economy in government. Why, the appropriations have been climbing up and up every single year of your Republican administration, and they are going to continue to climb until this House adopts the policy which every one of the distinguished men I have mentioned has advocated from this floor, and that is the policy of making specific appropriations rather than general or lump-sum appropriations. Mr. Fitzgerald advocated it. Mr. Swagar Sherley advocated it. Mr. James W. Good advocated it. Mr. Martin B. Madden advocated it. Dan Anthony advocated it. WILL WOOD has advocated it and JOE BYRNS has advocated it. I have heard them all say from this floor in the years gone by that without specific appropriations you would not have economy in government, and yet you have gone on and on making lump-sum appropriations by the hundreds of millions of dollars for bureaus and commissions and departments to spend at will, with very little check and with very little guidance. I am one of those who believes that every appropriation ought to be specific and duly protected by limitations, and as long as I am in this House I am going to fight for it. I am going to fight for specific appropriations for every bureau and for every commission of the Government, and if you want to get some economy that is the only way to get it. You know it as well as I do.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I always yield to the distinguished gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BEEDY. I thank the gentleman very much. The gentleman would not have the House understand that whatever lump-sum appropriations are made in the House are not in pursuance of specific items, every one of which has not only been considered by the committee but by the Director of the Budget.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, but they ought to be specifically stated in each appropriation bill.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman knows that is impossible. They are listed in the report of committee hearings.

Mr. BLANTON. When I came here they were so stated.

Mr. BEEDY. They always have been stated, have they not?

Mr. BLANTON. No; not for the last 10 years.

Mr. BEEDY. Have they not been thoroughly discussed in the report of the hearings held by the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. BLANTON. To a certain extent, yes, but not in the bill. The gentleman from Maine, if he has studied these conditions as I have studied them, knows there has been quite a change in them, from specific to lump sums.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman would not, in pursuance of economy, have the same reprints in the bill that have already been paid for by the Government in the printing of Appropriations Committee hearings and the Budget, would he?

Mr. BLANTON. I would have the same kind of bills and with the same kind of specifications in the supply bills that were in them when I came here in 1917.

If you go back and look at those bills, you will see there were so many employees mentioned at stated salaries, so much money for this specific purpose, so much money for that specific purpose, but you do not find these specifications in the bills in recent Congresses.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield to the wet, yet most valuable Member from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman, of course, understands that no head of a department or bureau can spend funds for a purpose other than that for which it is appropriated, and there is a check on every expenditure made.

Mr. BLANTON. But they can shift them about to suit themselves within certain indefinite limitations.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, they would never get by the comptroller.

Mr. BLANTON. They have certain limitations within which they can do some shifting, and I want to see that stopped.

Mr. RAINEY. I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman has just mentioned something with which I have had some personal experience. The gentleman will find, if he will study the hearings in the Appropriations Committee with a view to this particular, that it has been the custom of late for the subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations to have an understanding with the heads of departments that they will not shift balances under one item to another without the special consent of and a special rehearing by the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. For how many years has the gentleman from Maine served on the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. BEEDY. I have not served on the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. BLANTON. It is unfortunate the gentleman has not.

Mr. BEEDY. But I have had experience in this matter, and I can assure the gentleman I know whereof I speak.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman would study the bills closely and would check them up as I do and compare them with other bills, every single year with the previous year, as I do, and then check them with the Budget, he would understand what I mean when I speak of changes in the method of appropriating.

Mr. LUCE rose.

Mr. BLANTON. Just a moment. I want to call your attention to something that will interest even the gentleman from Massachusetts.

There came from his State, and probably that is the reason it was put over an administration of which your present President was then a Cabinet member, a proposal to spend $200,000 checking up a coal situation. They spent it and nothing was accomplished. I opposed it. I called attention to the fact that it would be wasted. Then there came from Massachusetts on the floor here a proposal to grant him $400,000 more. I opposed that and called attention to the fact that nothing would be accomplished; but the Congress, through Massachusetts, gave the President the $600,000 and all we got was a report about this thick [indicating] that nobody has ever yet read 10 pages of and the $600,000 of the people's money was wasted.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield for just an observation?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I want to tell about another thing.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman is making a serious indictment of himself when he says that nobody has read that report.

Mr. BLANTON. I know I have not read it. It was not worth reading. The gentleman from Maine has not read it. His time is devoted to more serious matters. No other man in Congress has ever read it and nobody ever will read it. It is stored away now in the basement where useless papers are stored.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. Did it not come from Massachusetts?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Have any of these investigations ever led anywhere or amounted to anything?

Mr. BLANTON. No; and never will. [Applause.]

Then right on the face of that your President has spent $500,000 already on his Wickersham Committee, and is there a man here who will get up and say it is worth 5 cents? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLANTON. Is there any man on this floor who will say it is worth 5 cents?

Mr. BEEDY. I will say it is worth 5 cents and a lot more.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does not the gentleman remember when I made a point of order against the Wickersham Commission appropriation, and the gentleman pleaded with me to withdraw my point of order so that the Wickersham Commission could go ahead? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will get the RECORD, he will find he is mistaken.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, no.

Mr. BLANTON. I did want to use some time to answer the gentlemen from Illinois, the brace of wets from Illinois, one from either side of the aisle [Mr. HULL and Mr. SABATH], but when that bunch of stalwart athletes from Alabama, the Alabama football team, whom we have just honored, ran a V wedge through both of them and through their wet arguments, there was not anything left of them, and therefore I do not have to answer them. I point to those athletes from Alabama as an answer to the wet arguments of the brace of wets from Illinois. They are athletes, they have won, they have been successful, and so successful that the House of Representatives does them honor, because not one of them can touch beer or wine or whisky when they are preparing themselves for the ordeal for which they are intended. [Applause.]

This answers their wet argument; and let me say to my wet, though valuable, friend from New York, who talks about helping the farmers to reduce taxes and bringing in revenue with his beer proposition, how much help is the beer revenue doing the German farmers and the German people to-day? [Applause.] What revenue is it bringing to the Canadian farmers? Are they in any better shape than ours?

You may take the beer countries of the world and you will find their liquor revenue is a bagatelle compared with what they have to raise from the taxpaying nationals of their country.

But I do not have to touch on that question, regardless of the propaganda of the big wet newspapers that are making the country believe that this is a wet Congress. I call attention to the fact that when you wets get a vote here under the new rules you will not muster 150 votes on this floor. There is no such question as beer and wine separated from the open saloon. It is the open saloon or it is prohibition. [Applause.] What are you going to do about it?

The Highway No. 1 in my State runs from El Paso through my city of Abilene to Texarkana in Texas 900 miles in an unbroken hard pavement. You can drive 80 miles an hour. Would you want to put a road house every 10 miles along that great highway? Not a man, woman, or child on it would be safe.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I do not believe that we will get anywhere in the legislative program of this Congress if we are going to criticize one party or the other. In my opinion, this is a time when every patriotic American citizen should at least in some degree forget his partisanship and stand for the issues and principles which will be for the best interests of the American people. [Applause.]

We have heard prohibition discussed this morning. I grant you it is one of the most important questions before the American people to-day, but as far as I am personally concerned I am not interested in trying to get back the legalization of the liquor traffic.

What I am interested in is trying to relieve the economic and unemployment situation as it is to-day. It seems to me that this is of more vital importance to our people than the question as to whether or not we will again legalize the liquor traffic. [Applause.]

This is not the only depression we have had. I have a vivid recollection of the depression in 1893. I want to say to you that it is my honest opinion that the depression of to-day in many respects is not as bad as the depression of 1893. I was just a young chap at that time. My father was at the head of a large family. In order to give some of the men in our steel mills work we passed a bond issue to improve a beautiful natural park we have in my part of the country. It was decided to give to the head of each family five days' work at a dollar a day. My father was lying in bed sick. They said to me, "Do you think you can take his place?" I said I believed I could. While I was only a young chap, I went out to that park and swung the ax and the pick and used the shovel, and I worked for a dollar a day in 1893 in order to bring a little bread and butter into our family home. This was at a time when the Democratic Party had control of Congress and under a Democratic President. There was a difference between that depression and this. In those days we had not much to lose. We were hungry and we needed shoes and clothing, but we did not have all of the comforts and blessings to lose that we have had during the past 10 years.

We did not have the improved sanitary conditions in our homes; we did not have electric lights; we did not have frigidaire; we did not have our automobiles and our paved streets and our fine roads; we did not have our talking movie pictures and radio. That is the difference between the depression of 1893 and that of 1931.

What I want to talk to you about to-day is the tariff question which was discussed here by several Members of this House yesterday. Never in the history of our country have we witnessed such a flow of propaganda as is now being directed against the American tariff. It emanates in a large measure from powerful factors with heavy investments abroad and from those importing interests which have always taken an undue share of the American market through the handling of foreign products produced at such low cost that similar American articles have been unable to compete with them.

There is also a strong national publicity campaign, which is financed by powerful interests, now being carried on that many foreign nations have increased their tariffs in retaliation against our present tariff law, which was passed by Congress in 1930. And as a result American foreign trade, both imports and exports, have fallen off.

The question which I shall speak about now is, Has our present tariff policy, adopted in 1930, caused foreign countries to retaliate against us and have our imports and exports fallen off?

The facts are, and the record will show, that long before our present tariff policy became effective foreign countries, under the pressure of domestic needs, increased their tariffs and adopted other methods of discrimination against imports from the United States. When the present tariff law was passed, Canada already had in effect a law which was collecting, in customs duties, a larger percentage of the value of American imports than is collected by the United States from Canadian products under our present tariff law.

Two years ago the voters of Canada elected into power the Conservative Party. A short time after the party assumed power, Premier Bennett presented to the parliament a measure for a revision of their tariff laws upward. This measure was presented before our present tariff law became effective. At the time he made a statement carried in the press, which I now read:

This is a news dispatch from the city of Ottawa, Canada, dated September 18. It says:

For the second time within six months Canada has made a complete change in her tariff policy. The Conservatives adopted "Canada First" as their slogan and insisted that while they were anxious to help the mother country, their first concern was to build up Canadian industry.

Does that look like a matter of retaliation against the United States? Then the Premier said this:

We have very definite assurances from those who are charged with producing in this country that as a result of the action we are taking to-day they will increase the number of men and women in their employ.

A little later on he made this statement:

He declared it was right and proper to glorify international relations and to be interested in the welfare of other countries, but insisted that his job was to take care of Canada. "This Government," said the Premier, "owes primarily a duty to the Canadian people and not to some other people, for the simple and obvious reason that the electors of Canada and not the electors of other countries have selected a government to govern Canada. Legislation must be initiated first of all in regard to Canada, with regard to its growth and development and employment, and happiness and prosperity of its people."

I wish that we had some American statesmen who would stand on the floor of this Congress and be as much interested in the welfare of America as Premier Bennett has been in the interest and welfare of the Canadian people. [Applause.]

There is too much of the spirit of internationalism sweeping throughout the United States at this time. We have millions and billions to loan to foreign countries. I say the time has come now when the Congress of the United States should consider relief and welfare of the people at home as well as the welfare of foreign countries.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Pardon me, but I can not yield now. Many times within the last year I have heard some of my friends, Senators and Representatives of the Democratic Party, charge that by reason of the passage of the tariff act of 1930 American capital had been forced to go into foreign lands. A short time ago I read with some interest a series of articles which were written by an American newspaper man, which contained a bitter attack upon our present tariff system. The writer tried hard to leave the impression with his readers that since the passage of the tariff law American capital had been forced to go abroad. Let me read to you some of the things he said:

Tens of thousands of American workers are jobless to-day because the present tariff policy of the United States has utterly failed to protect what is perhaps the largest industry—foreign trade itself.

He is writing these articles from Toronto. He says:

Before coming here I visited Akron, the rubber capital of the world. There I saw how vicious the policy can be. As a conservative estimate, I was told that Akron to-day has a total unemployment of approximately 12,000, while between 4,000 and 7,000 jobless have left the city. "It is not at all difficult," one Akron observer told me, "to trace our unemployment to the forces of migration of part of our industry."

Then he goes on to say that more than 3,000,000 tires were made in the Province of Ontario last year because we passed the tariff act of 1930, that American capital was investing its money in Canada, that it had to on account of the retaliation on the part of the Canadian Government against our present tariff law. My friends, if that were true, it would be a serious question which should be given careful and thoughtful consideration by every American citizen. But what are the facts in regard to this?

After reading this attack on the tariff law I made a trip to Akron and called upon the vice president of probably the largest rubber industry in the world. I said to him, "When did your company first invest its money in the rubber industry in Canada?" He immediately replied by saying, "In 1913." I said, "When did you erect that large plant in Toronto, which employs between 3,000 and 5,000 workers?" He said, "In 1920." I said, "When did the other rubber industry go into Canada?" "About the same time."

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to finish this thought, and then I will yield? It was also charged by this writer that the automobile industry had gone into Canada on account of the passage of our tariff law. To my personal knowledge, General Motors has operated a plant at Oshawa in the Province of Ontario for the last 12 years. In 1927 I visited in that city for about three weeks. I went through the plant. There I saw anywhere from 3,000 to 5,000 Canadian workers going into that automobile plant every day. They were manufacturing every car from the Buick on down, that is made in the United States. Mr. Ford has had an assembling plant in Canada for the last 15 years.

Those opposed to the present tariff law charge that American capital was forced to invest in Canada in the automobile and rubber industries because the Republicans passed the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922 and the tariff act of 1930. But, mark this, and I want some Democrat to challenge this statement, if he can: American capital was first invested in the rubber industry and in the automobile industry in Canada from 1913 to 1920, at the time when the United States was not operating under the protective-tariff system, but under the Underwood free-trade tariff bill, one of the most liberal free-trade policies we have ever had in the history of this country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. THURSTON. I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. THURSTON. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that on account of the lowered wage levels and reduced production costs the duties in our tariff act were automatically reduced?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. That is true.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question as to Akron?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Texas if he does not take too much time.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that the Akron Beacon-Journal is one of the old-time, rock-ribbed Republican newspapers?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I hope the gentleman will not make a speech.

Mr. BLANTON. Is that not a fact?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Please do not go into that.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, has the gentleman read the very important editorial recently in the Akron Beacon-Journal, the Republican newspaper, and has the gentleman seen that wonderful cartoon that has recently appeared there?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. No, I have not; but I will ask the gentleman to please not take my time.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman should look it up.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Another charge is made that our custom duties on imports are the highest of any country in the world. Again let me bring to you the facts in this respect. I have with me here to-day a tabulation submitted to me by the Growers' Tariff League of California, which shows the import tariff rates of the United States and 53 leading foreign countries on each of 25 commodities, most of which are agriculture. Please bear in mind that our import duties on agriculture products as a whole are the highest of any commodities in our tariff law. These rates have all been reduced to a common basis of United States dollars and cents per 100 pounds. And this is what we find: The average duties charged by these 53 foreign countries on commodities thereon named is $4.05 per 100 pounds, as against an average duty of $1.81 charged by the United States on the same commodities. The tabulation of this report is based upon an analysis of a recent tariff survey made by Mr. Edwin Phole, California State Bureau of Commerce, by direction of Hon. James Rolph, jr., Governor State of California, from statistics furnished by Hon. H. P. Fletcher, Chairman of the Federal Tariff Commission.

Another charge that is made by those opposed to our tariff policy is that we are loosing our foreign trade on account of import duties we impose. Again, what are the facts in this respect? Let us take the 20 leading markets of the world, and that takes in practically all of our foreign trade.

Now, I grant you that our volume of exports has fallen off, but, are we losing our foreign trade as compared with foreign trade of other countries?

I find that our share of exports to these 20 countries in 1930 was 20 per cent of their total imports. Now, let us go back and compare the average of the years of 1924 to 1927, which were pretty good years, and what do we find? We had in those same markets in that time three to five years before the present tariff law was passed 20.7 per cent of their total import trade as against 20 per cent of last year. These figures and facts were furnished to me by the Department of Commerce at Washington.

In this time of economic depression which is sweeping our country to-day there are many American industries that are suffering from foreign competition. A few days ago I was consulted by officials of two of our large steel industries. They are very much worried because they are about to lose a market for a by-product of our coke ovens, which is known as sulphate of ammonia. The Germans are importing this product into the United States to-day at a cost cheaper than any steel plant in the United States can produce it. Men in the steel industry have also informed me that to-day foreign countries are unloading fabricated steel on the Atlantic coast and in the ports of the Gulf of Mexico at a cost cheaper than we can produce it and ship it to those ports by rail. Only a short time ago an ocean freight-carrying vessel crossed the Atlantic, down the St. Lawrence River into the new Welland Canal, through the Great Lakes system, and docking at Chicago with a cargo of steel Belgian wire. This is not the time to break down our present tariff system.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would rather finish now. I only have a few minutes left. If I have time I will be glad to yield later.

The demand of some of our leading international bankers, industrialists, and others, supported by a number of economists, to further the free-trade policy, to enlarge the importation of goods, produced by forced labor (Russia), low paid, and child labor of Europe and Asia, and the cry for a more liberal immigration policy can only lead to further unemployment and demoralize our economic, industrial, social, and political structure.

Those who argue that the way to cure unemployment in the United States is to consume more of the products of foreign labor underestimate the intelligence of the American people.

Such propaganda bespeaks the desire of international capitalists, who wish to lower the standard of wages and living in this country to that of foreign lands in order that their vast foreign investments may be protected.

To wipe out our protective tariff at this time would undermine and lessen the employment opportunities and standards of life and work of American wage earners by flooding our domestic market with foreign goods.

WHAT WOULD EUROPE BUY OF US?

The opponents of our tariff policy try hard to make the people believe that there is a high import duty on all foreign products that come into the United States.

In 1930 there was $3,061,000,000 worth of imports entered the United States from foreign lands, of which 65 per cent came in duty free.

One of the international capitalists who made a bitter attack upon the present tariff law when the same was before Congress for consideration moved his tractor factory from Detroit to Ireland more than two years ago. He was quoted in the press as stating his reason for moving his factory to a foreign land was to get a cheaper production cost. It is said that several thousand American workmen were deprived of employment when the Detroit factory was closed down. I grant the right of this manufacturer to establish his industry in a foreign country, but I can not contend that he has the right to export the products of the factory into the United States free of import duties.

I hold in my hand a report signed by the United States vice consul at Dublin, Ireland. It is the official report on the number of tractors exported from Cork, Ireland, for the first six months of the year 1930. In this column you will see the names of 29 foreign countries; and over here you will see the number of tractors that were exported from Cork, Ireland, to these different countries, for the first six months of 1930. The total number of tractors exported to these 29 foreign countries for the first six months of 1930 was 13,605.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. In addition to that there was exported $3,500,000 worth of parts. Now, here is what we find: To Belgium there were exported 103, to Denmark, 196, and to Finland, 63. I will not stop to read them all; but, as I said a moment ago, the total was 13,605. Now, listen to what is shown on the top line. To the United States of America, 6,609. In other words, 50 per cent of the tractors which were exported from Cork, Ireland, to 29 foreign countries during the first six months of 1930, was sent into the United States; and they came in here duty free classified as agricultural implements. I want to repeat that this gentleman had a perfect right to take the money which he received from the American people and establish this industry in Ireland, but it seems to me that he has no moral right to send those tractors back into the United States classified as agricultural implements and have them enter our ports duty free.

I hope this Congress will do something which will cause this gentleman to pay a duty on this manufactured article. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. PARKS. They came into the United States free under the tariff bill which your party introduced and passed, with the consent of you and these other gentlemen.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I will not admit that.

Mr. PARKS. Why did you not put a duty on them if it is wrong?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. We thought there was a duty on them, but the Commissioner of Customs ruled tractors were agricultural implements and admitted them duty free.

Mr. PARKS. Why did you not do it?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. We will do it if you give us a chance.

Mr. PARKS. But you signed away your day of grace, and you can not do it now.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does not the gentleman believe that we are justified in taxing the income of the particular gentleman to whom he refers 49 per cent over $1,000,000?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. That is all right with me.

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. I want to say to the gentleman that there was a duty on tractors, but because these were brought in as agricultural implements they came in free. However, there is a duty on automobiles.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Now, I want to finish. This summer I happened to tune in on the radio and heard my good genial friend Mr. BUSBY, of Mississippi, delivering a speech. He received a lot of publicity in the newspapers, but how he was lambasting that tariff act. As I recall, here was his solution for the payment of the allied debt. Take it out in foreign trade. In other words, he suggested that the Allies pay us that debt in goods. It may be that we shall have to cancel that $11,000,000,000 some of these days. I am not ready to cancel it yet. But if I had to take my choice between canceling the foreign debt or taking it out in foreign goods, I would say it would be ten thousand times better for us to cancel the debt instead of accepting foreign goods that would destroy our American industry and American labor. [Applause.]

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I am wondering where you are going to start in lowering these tariff schedules. Are you going to start on manufacturing and agricultural products; on shoes? Are you going to start on hides; on the products of the Southland? I remember what you said to us when we put 10, 15, and 20 per cent duty on hides, shoes, and leather. You charged this duty would add a burden of $300,000,000 on the American people, yet ever since that law became effective the price of shoes has gradually gone down, and to-day shoes are cheaper than they were when they were on the free list.

Where are you going to start to lower the tariff? I ask you. It will not do you any good to lower the tariff on manufactured articles made in our industrial districts and keep the increased duty on agricultural products. I say to you that in my own district at this time more than 15,000 working men are unemployed who buy your agricultural products when they are at work, and anything you do that will tend in any way to destroy American industry and American labor will hurt your agricultural interests. [Applause.]

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEENEY].

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I am a new Member of this body. I trust you will not think I am presumptuous if I extend to you a compliment and in the same breath try to criticize you. My observation is that when you are sitting in Committee of the Whole you are very attentive and the gallery is able to hear what you are saying and the Members can hear what you are saying; but when you are resolved back to the regular order of business, as I observed the other day, we find a great deal of confusion.

I tried to listen attentively to the debate on the important matter of revision of the rules. I found a lot of chaos. I heard Congressmen discussing the Japanese war, some of them talking about the presidential campaign and two dry Congressmen, who vote dry consistently, were discussing the bad quality of Washington liquor. I will not tell you their names. I am not a Smedley Butler.

My observation also is that the women of this body behave like perfect gentlemen, while some of the men behave like a lot of old women. [Laughter.]

We are discussing now the President's message on the state of the Union, and I am reminded of the story of the little boy who was called upon one day to answer a question in geography. The teacher said, "Johnny, what is the shape of the world," and Johnny said, "Teacher, it is in a hell of a shape." This may be applied to the state of the Union to-day.

I listened to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] draw the implication that this side of the House is committed to a dole. By way of digression, I may say that the most important thing before this Congress is the relief of the unemployed.

I criticize the President of the United States for his pocket veto of the Wagner measure in the last Congress that would have allocated $500,000,000 to various parts of this country and bring relief, and abolish, to some extent, the bread lines we enjoy to-day. I despise the dole system, but I am for a dole in preference to a bread line. The bread line humiliates a man and causes him to lose his self-respect. The dole makes a man feel that his government has some interest in him.

I made some casual study of the dole in England, and I reached the conclusion that the smart politicians and the far-sighted statesmen of England put into effect the dole, Mr. Chairman, to ward off revolution and to allay the rebellious temper of the millions of persons who are constantly out of work.

I saw the group that came to the Capitol Plaza Monday. They did not excite me and they did not excite this Congress. We believe in giving them an opportunity to exercise their freedom of speech. Let them expound their philosophy, be it good, bad, or indifferent.

I also read the message or speech delivered over the radio in anticipation of this march on Congress of Mr. HAMILTON FISH, the chairman of your committee to investigate communistic activities in the United States, and he stated that it was the conclusion of his committee that there are between 500,000 and 600,000 communists and communistic sympathizers in the United States. A mere guess, a mere conjecture, I am thinking of the 6,000,000 men who are unemployed, the 6,000,000 men who know that the granaries in Wisconsin and Minnesota are choking with grain, a great deal of it owned by the Federal Farm Board; and who know that the cold-storage houses of the land are laden with food products, and who read in the papers that in 1929 Henry Ford made $49,000,000, and who read in the papers that the estate of George Baker amounted to $86,000,000, and who read in the papers that the estate of Payne Whitney, now being administered in the surrogate's court in New York, amounted to $225,000,000. I wonder if these 6,000,000 people are not sympathizers with the communist philosophy when they face the prospect of suffering this winter.

The unemployment problem is a problem of government that the Nation expects this Congress—the most important Congress, I think, since the war Congress—to grapple with, and I am surprised that the message of the President of the United States is silent on this matter except in an indirect way. He talks about the proposed Federal home discount banks, and I say to you frankly, I do not know what my colleagues will do in this direction, but I have a sympathetic approach to this problem that will release these frozen credits, revive industry, and reach the great objective—the abolition of unemployment. If it does this, I can very conscientiously support a measure of that kind regardless of the side from which it comes. But, mark you, the Nation expects this matter of immediate relief to be given first attention; delay in this matter is dangerous and may incite revolution. I am satisfied we can meet the emergency.

Let us approach this problem as the Nation expects us to approach it and arrive at a proper solution. I see nothing repugnant in asking the Federal Government to give immediate aid to people when they are suffering and unemployed. Many subdivisions of Government are doing that at the present time.

The gentleman on the other side from South Dakota, if he did not coin that phrase, repeated the phrase attributed to the President of the United States—no one has starved, no one will starve. I challenge the gentleman and I challenge the President of the United States to say that there have not been any undernourished men, women, and children, and that there are not now undernourished men, women, and children, and that there will not be undernourished persons during the coming winter. Undernourishment is malnutrition and is only a stepping-stone to starvation.

I heard the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] state a case in point when he talked about the indirect dole by community chests and charitable organizations that advocate the giving of a basket of groceries and secondhand clothes to these people, and the gentleman told you of a case where a family of five were living on $4 a week. Does not this bring about undernourishment? The workingman does not want a basket of groceries or cast-off garments. He wants a chance to work. He wants a chance to buy his own groceries, to buy his own clothes, and to look after his wife and children, so that they may have new clothes once in a while, be they of gingham, satin, or silk, or any other material, and he wants the opportunity to secure some of the comforts of life and save for the inevitable old age.

The problem of the unemployed man must receive solution at the hands of this body over any other legislation submitted.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], who preceded me, is an ardent dry, a sincere dry. I pay tribute to his sincerity. He is not that type of a dry who goes to the wash room, takes a drink of liquor, and then comes back on the floor and votes dry. He is honest. There are a few of that type left. He said that prohibition was one of the important questions before the American public.

I am also concerned with the attitude of the President of the United States. I am surprised that he has made no mention of this question of prohibition. Perhaps he is of the opinion, as he always has been, that this is a noble experiment. At least he characterizes it in this fashion for political reasons. Now, when we are spending $35,000,000 to enforce a law that can not be enforced, and are coming close to a deficit of $2,000,000,000, this great engineer is silent.

Where is the statesmanship, where is the leadership? I wonder what Al Smith, Governor Roosevelt, Governor Ritchie, or Newton D. Baker would do under such circumstances. I trust that when the Seventy-third Congress opens that we shall not be in the condition described by the schoolboy but that the state of the Union shall be sound and healthy.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEENEY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does the gentleman state that his party on that side will give this House an opportunity to vote on the prohibition question?

Mr. SWEENEY. I am coming to that. I think we have as many drys on this side as you have on that.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. SWEENEY. I shall do it after a while. Mr. Chairman, I come to this Congress from a law court. I resigned my seat on November 4. Up until that time, from the first of the year, in my city I have had before me almost 25,000 individuals charged with intoxication. The court to which I was attached in 1929 had 32,000 individuals charged with intoxication in that year—almost as much as the entire country of England had for the same violations in the same given year. Among those 32,000 were boys and girls from clean homes, respectable homes, from the homes of many whose parents were ardent prohibitionists. The average age of those charged was 25 years, demonstrating that they were boys and girls who were in the grade schools when our prohibition friends told us the next generation would never know the taste of alcoholic beverages. Who were they? I saw the splendid body of men in the gallery to-day, the football team from Alabama, and I heard my friend BLANTON from Texas make reference to their habits, claiming that they would not be football players unless they abstained from alcohol; but I have seen football players and boxers and wrestlers and strong people who now are the victims of "canned heat," "raisin-jack," "lightning," and all these other picturesque terms that have gotten into the vocabulary of the American people since prohibition. Chaos and lawlessness rise up to challenge the very existence of government itself, yet men here in this Hall refuse in a democracy to even submit the question back to the people to get an expression of the people themselves. I am afraid that I am going to witness some degree of hypocrisy in this important assembly. I hope there is courage here, and I hope there is no group that will control anybody. I hope you will throw off the shackles of the Anti-Saloon League that has cowed and deluded you for years because of the assumed fear that they might go back to your constituents and get your political scalp. I say, let us get together on the constructive program; let us be fair and honest. We have to undo the things that you did on the Republican side for 10 years under Coolidge economy and Hoover prosperity. It is going to be a mighty hard task, but we will meet it with a good spirit, and we are going to be successful. I want to be honest with the Members of this House. I want to be respectful to the Members of this House on any given question during my tenure here. In debate sometimes we will become heated and make references we should not make; but in the noble spirit of American fair play, the spirit that has always characterized the gentlemen of this House, which has been designated as the greatest deliberative body in the world, I am sure fairness and courtesy will prevail. If I have said anything that may seem offensive to any of you, I apologize, and thank you for your attention in this my initial appearance. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the course of a dream takes its way, often with great vividness and clearness of incident, but always wholly free from those limitations of logic involved in the sequence of cause and effect which are imposed upon our waking faculties. The authors of the Arabian Nights and of Alice in Wonderland succeeded in a large degree in capturing the elusive dream quality and in setting it down on paper.

Something, I think, of this dream quality has infused itself into this period in which we are living. It is so rich in novelty and surprising incident, pleasing or otherwise, that life tends to bewilder the onlooker, to influence him at times to confuse cause and consequence, or to look on, indifferent, without even making the effort to ascribe a cause to an event or to dispute the accuracy of an alleged cause. It makes it much easier to prove something that one desires to have proved, just as it did in Alice's Wonderland.

And if the multiplicity of sensations with which the course of ordinary private life is now attended confuses in a measure the reasoning powers, how much more powerful must be the force of international incidents, piling one upon another, in their impact upon the mind of the public official. This, perhaps, may account for certain inaccuracies which may be detected in reports of high officials and even in the messages of the Executive to the Congress.

Before final action is taken upon the measure now before the House I shall have some further remarks to make, but I wish to-day to confine myself to the message of the President on the moratorium and to point out some things in it which have bearing upon the remarks which I have just made.

The first 10 paragraphs are a quotation from a public statement which the President made on June 20 last, when he first proposed a suspension of payments on war debts. They, of course, tell us nothing that we did not know on June 20.

Nearly six months have passed since then, during which, presumably, the customary cataract of picturesque incident has continued to flow; but if anything has happened bearing on the President's proposal of June 20, he does not inform the Congress of it. Presumably nothing that had an important bearing upon that proposal took place or he would have taken care to inform the Congress in this message.

The first statement he makes, not a quotation from his statement of June 20, is in the eleventh paragraph, and is as follows:

All the important creditor governments accepted this proposal. The necessary agreements among them have been executed, and creditor governments have foregone the receipt of payments due them since July 1, 1931.

This, Mr. Chairman, is all that the President tells us. And he asks that a law be enacted before next Monday authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to postpone the payments, and to provide for their payment over a 10-year period. He also states that it will be necessary to make still further temporary adjustments.

For myself, I confess just now to feeling a kinship with Alice as she looked about her in Wonderland. The Queen and others were quite pleasant and patronizing, and while they did some strange things they were often quite generous. There seems to me to be something of this same sort of generosity when the Executive reminds us that the Congress has shared in the past the consideration of questions arising from these debts, and states his confidence that it will commend itself to the Congress that the legislative branch of the Government should continue to share this responsibility. In dreamland, no doubt, the Congress might choose not to continue to share this responsibility, but in our waking hours we are held to it by the requirements of the Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, officially nothing has happened in international affairs since June 20 last affecting the proposal of the President to foreign governments on that date. It is the proposal that he made then that he now asks us to ratify. If any important modifications had been made, he would have told us in this message. How else would we be informed?

Let us see, then, what the agreement with foreign governments, as explained to us in this message, is. It reads as follows:

The American Government proposes the postponement during one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparations, and relief debts, both principal and interest, of course not including obligations of governments held by private parties. Subject to confirmation by Congress, the American Government will postpone all payments upon the debts of foreign governments to the American Government payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1 next, conditional on a like postponement for one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts owing the important creditor powers.

This is the agreement which we have before us to ratify, and you will note that it postpones all payments on intergovernmental debts and reparations. It postpones payment on all German reparations, and in connection with them the President states his views, as follows:

I wish to take this occasion also to frankly state my views upon our relations to German reparations and the debts owed us by the Allied Governments of Europe. Our Government has not been a party to, or exercised any voice in determination of, reparation obligations. We purposely did not participate in either general reparations or the division of colonies or property. The repayment of debts due to us from the Allies for the advance for war and reconstruction were settled upon a basis not contingent upon German reparations or related thereto. Therefore reparations is necessarily wholly a European problem with which we have no relation. * * * We are not involved in the discussion of strictly European problems, of which the payment of German reparations is one.

I have now set forth everything that the President's message contains upon this subject. When we ratify, we will have ratified the agreement of June 20 in its pristine purity, unmodified by any subsequent agreement; and we have the President's assurance that we have not been a party to, or exercised any voice in, determination of reparation obligations.

The things that I am going to discuss now are all hearsay. Their evidential value is so much lower than that of the information which comes to this body in a message from the President that perhaps I ought to ask the forbearance of the House for their somewhat lengthy presentation. It is a series of statements made in various newspapers concerning international events, particularly those between June 20 and August 11 last. The contents of newspapers, as we know, are not always reliable, and I beg that you will bear in mind that I do not vouch for the truth of these events. However, as these things were printed in only a few of the newspapers of the country, and as some of the Members may not have seen them, or seen all of them, it may be of interest to state them here.

The first is the full text of a Franco-American war-debt accord, approved and initialed on July 6. The first two paragraphs are the only ones which need interest us. They are:

1. The payment of intergovernmental debts is postponed from July 1, 1931, to June 30, 1932.
2. However, the Reich will pay the amount of unconditional annuity.

It appears from the press reports that Great Britain, Belgium, Italy, and other countries had promptly ratified the Hoover moratorium of June 20. When, therefore, the United States and France made a treaty agreement substantially changing it, it became necessary for the governments which had already acted on the proposal of June 20 to reconsider their action. Therefore, the experts met at London and signed the text of a protocol with Germany on August 11, to be ratified by the Governments of Belgium, France, Germany, Great Britain and North Ireland, Italy, and Japan. The preamble read as follows:

Whereas on June 20, 1931, the President of the United States of America made proposals for the suspension of intergovernmental debts falling due during the year extending from July 1, 1931, to June 30, 1932; and

Whereas the governments signatories of the present protocol have accepted said proposal and have agreed to apply them in particular to the obligations of the German Government under the agreement signed at The Hague January 20, 1930; and

Whereas the French Government and the Government of the United States of America concluded an arrangement on this subject at Paris on July 6, 1931; and

Whereas it is accordingly necessary to provide for the application of the new plan in the conditions thus created;

And in view of the report dated August 11, 1931, drawn up by the experts who met in London for this purpose;

The undersigned, duly authorized to that effect, have agreed as follows:

The protocol consists of eight articles which are too long to quote here and which deal with the conditional and the unconditional annuities of the German reparations. They apparently implement the shorter Franco-American agreement of July 6.

Mr. Chairman, is not the presentation to the Congress of a message like this a ridiculous spectacle? Has the Congress of the United States ceased to be a coordinate branch of Government, has its dignity so shrunk, and has its judgment become so negligible that it may be treated with as scant courtesy as any European monarch might show to his parliament when dealing with a foreign question? This message does not only ignore and omit vitally important and essential elements of the agreements made with foreign governments; it conveys the impression that ratification is asked of the agreement proposed on June 20 last when, in fact, that agreement has been superseded by an entirely different one.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I would like to yield, but I want to get through with what I have to say.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman in that connection state under what authority the President of the United States made the proposition to which he refers, constitutional or otherwise?

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is a constitutional lawyer, I am not; perhaps before the debate is over that question may be answered.

If this body is to have before it the information that is essential to an intelligent judgment, the agreement can not be ratified by next Monday or Tuesday. It ought to be subject to free and open debate and its scope and meaning clearly brought out.

It was not intended under the Constitution that the control of foreign policy should pass out of the hands of the Congress. A distant war on the Continent of Europe vested the Executive with extraordinary powers, and some occupants of that office since then have seemed desirous of retaining in peace time functions which only in war time pertain to that office.

Throughout the last session I urged with the greatest earnestness that attention be focussed more closely on the character of the peace agreement with Germany, because of the fact that the peace terms which brought the hostilities of the war to an end had been negotiated by an American President. The settlements of the definitive treaty made eight months later differ in an extraordinary degree from the agreement that brought the fighting to an end. Mr. Chairman, the question whether the treaty of Versailles violated the preliminary agreement negotiated by President Wilson will not down. It is the question which has kept the Continent of Europe in fearful turmoil and agitation for 13 years, and unless it is answered, and answered in accordance with truth, it will keep that continent in turmoil for 13 years more.

The London ultimatum of 1921, the Dawes plan of 1924, and the Young plan of 1929 are all predicated upon the assertion that the treaty of Versailles was legitimately obtained and that it did not violate the agreement with Germany negotiated by President Wilson. Why is it that these European settlements should have had the effect of agitating American opinion so continuously through the years? Why, if German reparations do not concern us, are we now making treaty settlements concerning the Young plan?

It is because the moment we recognize by treaty settlements the validity of the Young plan, which the European Governments adopted by treaty settlements at The Hague last year, in the same moment we recognize the validity of the treaty of Versailles, which up to this time we have not done. We recognize the validity of the treaty of Versailles, because, by descent through the London ultimatum and the Dawes plan, the Young plan gains its validity solely from the Versailles settlement; and we become a party to that portion of the treaty of Versailles which deals with German reparations, because the Young plan puts that portion of the treaty into effect.

It may be that the Congress, even at this late date, is willing to give its blessings to the reparation settlements of the treaty of Versailles. It is the goal for which the allied governments have striven for 13 years. For the first time in 13 years this would give stability to the status quo in Europe, but that stability would be obtained solely because the moral force of the United States, backed by its military power and by its financial power, guaranteed it. And, Mr. Speaker, let us not deceive ourselves; we would have a task that would tax our energies and resources to the utmost.

If there is a majority opinion here for American ratification of the reparation settlements of the treaty of Versailles, let us discuss the matter openly and determine in a frank and rational way why it is that we deem it best to take that action. If we deliberately desire to accept the principle of commercialization of the German reparation bonds, let us affirm that fact in open session and spread on the RECORD the logical reasons for adopting that principle; let us make it plain to ourselves and to the American people how great is the size of the bond issues which the international bankers will be permitted to offer here and what will be the political implications of their ownership by the American public.

To me there are strong reasons why we should not become a party to The Hague convention, as we will do if we ratify the settlements now before us concerning the Young plan; why we should not in this way ratify the reparation settlements of the treaty of Versailles; and I hope that there will be opportunity for me to place these reasons before the Congress before action is taken. It is not a question of sentimental considerations, it is not a question of sympathy for the Allies with whom we were associated in the war, or of sympathy for or hostility to Germany, whom we fought as an enemy during the war. It is purely a question of the international position of the United States and of the welfare of the American people.

Every competent observer to-day knows that French policy aspires to dominate all of capitalist Europe, not at the voluntary invitation of the numerous nations there, but by the aggressive use of arbitrary financial power and by the threat of military force. Every competent observer knows, also, that as a result of the Franco-American accord of July 6, which we are now asked to ratify, and of the visit of Premier Laval to Washington, the French Government and the French press are proclaiming the establishment of a common policy of France and the United States. They know also that if this common policy does exist, there is nothing for the other nations of Europe to do but to submit to the French power, not because of the strength of France alone, but because of the strength of the United States which stands behind her policy.

The French plans for the organization and administration of the political life of the entire capitalist part of the continent, under the guise of administration by the League of Nations, are taking definite form. The program for French foreign policy, as outlined to the deputies by former Premier Herriot, is as follows:

First. International organization of the production and dissemination of goods.

Second. Simultaneous reduction and controlled limitation of armaments.

Third. Extension of the powers of the League of Nations, and organization of international security, notably by:

(a) The internationalization of commercial aviation and placing at the disposition of the League of Nations of all military aircraft.

(b) Internationalization of lines of railway and navigation which could be utilized for the mobilization and transportation of troops.

(c) Absolute prohibition of the private manufacture and private sale of arms, munitions, materials, and engines of war.

(d) The organization of an international control which will render these internationalizations and prohibitions effective.

(e) An armament truce such as may be decided upon by the League of Nations.

There would be a vast difference between a powerful League of Nations possessing the powers above outlined, and created by the spontaneous and voluntary agreement of all the States of Europe, and an organization of this kind set up and imposed by French power upon unwilling nations. Which sort of a League of Nations is it that the French have in mind, and if it is the latter type, to what extent do they count upon the Franco-American accord of July 6 to make it effective?

Gentlemen, stop and think this over before you vote for the moratorium, and insist on getting the information that lies back under the cover and screen of this message.

Mr. Chairman, unless the Congress is prepared to abdicate its constitutional authority to fix foreign policy, it is imperative that it withhold ratification from agreements with foreign states about which the Executive is secretive and concerning which he fails to take the legislative branch into his confidence. Hasty ratification of such agreements must lead inevitably to the sinking of the legislative branch from the proud position which it has always occupied in the Government of this country and which is unique among the governments of the world.

Behind the insincere and sentimental governmental protests of devotion to international peace and of renunciation of war as a national policy there is going on in Europe to-day as fierce and ruthless a struggle of national interests and illegitimate ambitions as has characterized any earlier period of history. Similar struggles were taking place there when this Nation was in its infancy, and at that date its statesmen adopted a firm policy of standing aloof from those struggles and of making no alliances with foreign states. That early policy has met the approval of successive generations, and it is the wish of the American people to-day. They look to their representatives in Congress to maintain it, and to exercise all necessary vigilance to see that it be not infringed upon. There is need that we now examine more critically the policies of our State and Treasury Departments, and the activities of an irresponsible financial power which has been given shelter within the portals of those departments.

This measure before us needs examination. Ratification of it is fraught with momentous consequences. Bearing in mind what we know to be the sentiment of our constituents, let us accord it a thorough consideration, and approach it with that due deliberation which its importance demands and which is consistent with the dignity of the legislative branch of the United States Government. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein certain excerpts from the debates in the French House of Deputies on this particular subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I herewith insert the following.

Because of the colloquy that took place in the debate to-day, I am placing in the RECORD an extract from the debate in the French House of Deputies pertaining to the matter.

One of the French Senators, Dominique Delahaye, did not mince matters when he spoke. Among other things, he said:

Gentlemen, every time you have been on the point of a capitulation I have ascended this tribune in order to say to you, "You are making a mistake."

I have never been able to convince you, and thus, from mistake to mistake, from capitulation to capitulation, you have come to the point of being led by the nose by a gentleman named Hoover, whom you confound with the United States, as if the United States and Mr. Hoover were not absolutely different.

That is the confusion in which this debate has taken place. Now, we know already what we have experienced with a gentleman with a stepmother's smile who was named Wilson. You are going to have—I hope so—the same disenchantment, if Congress wishes to give to Hoover the lesson it gave to Wilson; but there is such an advantage for the bankers of the United States that I am afraid they will buy the Congress, as one says the practice is. If this is inexact, let the Congress correct it.

The French Chamber of Deputies met on June 26, 1931, and after a few preliminary matters had been disposed of, took up the discussion of the Hoover proposal in accordance with the order of the day. Premier Laval made a communication on behalf of the Government and was followed in turn by 11 Deputies who had reserved the right to address the chamber on the subject, and also by M. Pierre Etienne Flandin, the Minister of Finance. At this point I desire to place before you and to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a full account of the proceedings, as they are recorded in the Official Journal of the French Republic and as they have been translated in my office for your convenience.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE GOVERNMENT

The PRESIDENT. The President of the Council has the floor for a communication from the Government.

M. PIERRE LAVAL, President of the Council, Minister of the Interior. Gentlemen, before the debate on the interpellations begins, I have considered it to be my duty to place before you three documents. I shall read them without making any comments, reserving the right to answer the interpellators later.

Here is, first of all, the message from President Hoover:

The American Government proposes the postponement during one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparations and relief debts, both principal and interest, of course, not including obligations of governments held by private parties.

Subject to confirmation by Congress, the American Government will postpone all payments upon the debts of foreign governments to the American Government payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1 next, conditional on a like postponement for one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts owing the important creditor powers.

This course of action has been approved by the following Senators: HENRY F. ASHURST, HIRAM BINGHAM, WILLIAM E. BORAH, JAMES F. BYRNES, ARTHUR CAPPER, SIMEON D. FESS, DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, CARTER GLASS, WILLIAM J. HARRIS, PAT HARRISON, CORDELL HULL, WILLIAM H. KING, Dwight W. MORROW, GEORGE H. MOSES, DAVID A. REED, CLAUDE A. SWANSON, ARTHUR VANDENBERG, ROBERT F. WAGNER, DAVID I. WALSH, THOMAS J. WALSH, JAMES E. WATSON, and by the following Representatives: ISAAC BACHARACH, JOSEPH W. BYRNS, CARL R. CHINDBLOM, FRANK CROWTHER, JAMES W. COLLIER, CHARLES R. CRISP, THOMAS H. CULLEN, GEORGE P. DARROW, HARRY A. ESTEP, WILLIS C. HAWLEY, CARL E. MAPES, J. C. MCLAUGHLIN, EARL C. MICHENER, C. WILLIAM RAMSEYER, BERTRAND H. SNELL, JOHN Q. TILSON, ALLEN T. TREADWAY, and WILL R. WOOD. It has been approved by Ambassador Charles G. Dawes and by Mr. Owen D. Young.

The purpose of this action is to give the forthcoming year to the economic recovery of the world and to help free the recuperative forces already in motion in the United States from retarding influences from abroad.

The world-wide depression has affected the countries of Europe more severely than our own. Some of these countries are feeling to a serious extent the drain of this depression on national economy. The fabric of intergovernmental debts, supportable in normal times, weighs heavily in the midst of this depression.

From a variety of causes arising out of the depression, such as the fall in the price of foreign commodities and the lack of confidence in economic and political stability abroad, there is an abnormal movement of gold into the United States, which is lowering the credit stability of many foreign countries. These and the other difficulties abroad diminish buying power for our exports and, in a measure, are the cause of our continued unemployment and continued lower prices to our farmers.

Wise and timely action should contribute to relieve the pressure of these adverse forces in foreign countries and should assist in the reestablishment of confidence, thus forwarding political peace and economic stability in the world.

Authority of the President to deal with this problem is limited, as this action must be supported by the Congress. The President has been assured the cordial support of leading members of both parties in the Senate and the House. The essence of this proposition is to give time to permit debtor governments to recover their national prosperity. I am suggesting to the American people that they be wise creditors in their own interest and be good neighbors.

I wish to take this occasion also to frankly state my views upon our relations to German reparations and the debts owed to us by the allied Governments of Europe. Our Government has not been a party to or exerted any voice in determination of reparation obligations.

We purposely did not participate in either general reparations or the division of colonies or property. The repayment of debts to us from the Allies for the advance for war and reconstruction were settled upon a basis not contingent upon German reparations or related thereto. Therefore reparations is necessarily wholly a European problem with which we have no relation. [Exclamations and various movements.]

I do not approve in any remote sense of the cancellation of the debts to us. World confidence would not be enhanced by such action. None of our debtor nations has even suggested it. But as the basis of the settlement of these debts was the capacity under normal conditions of the debtor to pay, we should be consistent with our own policies and principles if we take into account the abnormal situation now existing in the world.

I am sure the American people have no desire to attempt to extract any sum beyond the capacity of any debtor to pay, and it is our view that broad vision requires that our Government should recognize the situation as it exists.

This course of action is entirely consistent with the policy which we have hitherto pursued. We are not involved in the discussion of strictly European problems of which the payment of German reparations is one. It represents our willingness to make a contribution to the early restoration of world prosperity in which our own people have so deep an interest.

I wish further to add that while this action has no bearing on the conference for limitation of land armaments to be held next February, inasmuch as the burden of competitive armaments has contributed to bring about this depression. ["Very good! Very good!" from the extreme left.] We trust that by this evidence of our desire to assist we shall have contributed to the good will which is so necessary in the solution of this major question. [Various movements.]

THE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL. This is the reply which the French Government has made to Mr. Hoover's message:

"The French Government has taken cognizance, with a lively interest, of the proposal of the President of the United States, and it declares itself in cordial accord with the elevated sentiments which inspired that proposal. [Various movements.]

"The French Government is, more than any other, desirous of seeing affirmed in the acts for the economic restoration of the world a solidarity with which it has always been inspired, whether in accepting successive reductions of the German debt or in executing the anticipated evacuation of the third zone of the Rhineland in exchange for a complete and definitive settlement of the program of reparations, decided at Geneva September 16, 1928.

"It must emphasize before the opinion of the world the extent of the new sacrifice which is asked of France after all those to which she has already agreed.

"In order to reply to the suggestion of President Hoover, the French Government is ready to ask the French Chambers, of which the intervention is indispensable and the decision sovereign [applause], that France abstain, provisionally and for a delay of one year, from conserving any payment on the part of the Reich. [Fresh applause.]

"But, being given the nature of the engagements of the Young plan, freely accepted and quite recently subscribed to, the solemnity with which was recognized the definitive and unalterable character of the unconditional annuities by which the necessary permanence of the principle of reparations was expressed [very good! very good!], the risk of shaking confidence in the value of signatures and of contracts [very good! very good!] and thus of going against the end aimed at would be great, if, in the proposed suspension of payments, the unalterable annuity were treated like the conditional annuity. [Applause.]

"The French Government emphasizes in particular that a formal assimilation has been established between the private debts of the Reich (Young loan and Kreuger loan) and the unconditional annuities not yet mobilized. To suspend the payment by Germany of the unconditional annuity while admitting that the Young loan placed with the public should continue to be served would go directly against a fundamental principle and express stipulations. [Very good! Very good!]

"The Government, then, considers that a moral interest of the first order is attached to this: That, even during the delay provided for by President Hoover, the payment of the unconditional annuity should not be altered in any way.

"The French Government, desirous of collaborating generously in every effort made to lessen the consequences of the present crisis, believes that it ought to point out, even in the interest of the success of this effort, that the general suspension of payments alone would not offer a sufficient remedy. The dangers threatening German economy and more generally European economy at the present time have a different origin and are related, notably, to important restrictions of credit or to withdrawals of foreign funds. The solution of the German crisis does not seem, therefore, to rest only in a diminution of the charges in the budget of the Reich but in an extension of credit.

"This is why the French Government declares itself ready, under the reservation of the approbation of Parliament, to put at the disposal of the Bank for International Settlements a sum equivalent to its part, for one year, of the unalterable annuity, under the single reservation of the sums necessary for the execution of the remainder of its contracts of loans in progress at the present time, which is, furthermore, useful for German economy.

"In making this proposal the French Government expects that the other beneficiaries of the Young plan will take the same decision, and it even hopes that other measures may be taken to favor the useful reestablishment of credit and of confidence in the world.

"The funds thus paid to the Bank for International Settlements may be immediately utilized for the amelioration of credit in Germany, as well as in the countries of Central Europe, and notably in those in which the suspension of the execution of the Young plan, during one year, might create financial or economic distress. [Very good; very good.] It goes without saying that the amounts thus employed will become payable again at the expiration of the period of one year provided for as the limit of the provisional suspension of the Young plan.

"The French Government is equally of the opinion that all useful precautions should be taken so that these sums, as well as those to come from the lightening of the budget of the Reich resulting from the suspension for one year of the payments of the Young plan, can not be utilized save for economic ends [very good; very good], all danger of the financing of dumping being set aside. [Very good, very good.]

"Finally, it would be opportune to provide, before the expiration of the delay of one year, for an examination of the measures to be taken by Germany for the resumption of her payments.

"The proposals of the French Government and the adjustments which the putting into practice of the American offer will suggest and which will necessarily form the subject of a further exchange of views thus appear perfectly compatible with the dominant idea of the proposal of President Hoover.

"In placing at the disposal of the Bank for International Settlements, upon the conditions stipulated in regard to this matter, her part of the unconditional annuity, France will be deprived during the period of suspension of what was assigned to her by virtue of the expenses she had to undergo for the restoration of her devastated regions.

"Without wishing to insist on the difference between the sums she has received and the sums she should have received, France recalls the fact that the total of her public debt amounts to-day to about four times that of the debt of the Reich and that her attempt at financial rehabilitation, pursued and realized by her own means, barely four years ago, should not be placed in jeopardy. [Applause.]

"The French Government is, then, able to affirm the solidarity of the French Republic and of the Republic of the United States, in the moment in which, faithful to their traditions, the two countries are cooperating in measures of safety in a crisis considered to be grave. They have the right to hope that their international good will will be answered by respect for treaties and by the restoration of confidence among peoples—conditions of the future of peace." [Applause.]

M. HENRY FRANKLIN-BOUILLON. And now, Frenchmen, pay three milliards more of taxes!

The PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL. Here, now, is the letter which the ambassador of the United States has addressed to the Minister of Foreign Affairs:

PARIS, June 26, 1931.

Mr. MINISTER. I have to-day received from my Government a telegram reading as follows:

"The American Government appreciates the cordiality with which the French Government has replied to the proposal of the President. It hopes that the French Government will profit by the presence of the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to discuss with him and with the ambassador the different problems raised by the original proposal of the President and the French reply. The ambassador and Mr. Mellon have received full information concerning the views of the American Government."

Accept the renewed assurance of my high esteem and my best sentiments.

WALTER E. EDGE.

M. GRATIEN CANDACE. There is no further need for debate.

DISCUSSION OF SEVERAL INTERPELLATIONS ON THE AMERICAN PROPOSAL CONCERNING WAR DEBTS

The PRESIDENT. The order of the day calls for the discussion of the interpellations:

1. Of M. Margaine on the situation created by the decision taken by the Government of the United States to propose the suspension during one year of the payment of war debts;

2. Of M. Dubois on the attitude which the Government expects to adopt toward the American proposal relative to the war debts;

3. Of M. Louis Marin on the participation of France in the negotiations which have resulted in the declaration of the President of the United States, on the exact sense of the proposals which it contains, on the negotiations which are the result of it, and on the procedure which the Government will adopt in order that the chamber may pronounce its views with a knowledge of the matter before any engagement is made, conformably to the recent promise of the president of the council;

4. Of M. Nicolle on the proposal of President Hoover in view of our economic situation;

5. Of M. Pierre Cot on the measures which the Government expects to take in order to insert the proposal of Mr. Hoover in a plan for the economic reorganization of Europe;

6. Of M. Camille Planche on the opportunity for France to avail herself of the proposal of President Hoover in order to bring about an effective policy of disarmament;

7. Of M. Leon Blum on the situation created by the offer of President Hoover;

8. Of M. Bergery on the measures to be taken to attach the reply to the American proposal to a common policy in regard to Germany;

9. Of M. Marcel Heraud on the attitude which the Government expects to take in regard to the proposals formulated by President Hoover relative to a suspension of the payment of war debts;

10. Of M. Xavier Vallat on the exact practical significance of the proposal of Mr. Hoover and of the reply which has been given to him by the French Government;

11. Of M. Pezet on the spirit and the positive plan according to which the Government intends to reconcile respect for our rights and the balance of our economy with a policy of economic collaboration between peoples and of moral disarmament, which are equally indispensable to perfect international security, a policy which would be the justification of the sacrifices conceded in the reply to the proposal of President Hoover;

12. Of M. Thebault on the inspiration, the exact sense, and the result of the American proposal of President Hoover.

M. JEAN MISTLER. We request a suspension of the session.

The PRESIDENT. M. Mistler requests a suspension of the session. M. Mistler has the floor.

M. JEAN MISTLER. I should like to justify, in a few words, the request for suspension which we have presented.

The Chamber has just listened with great calm and extreme attention to three very important documents, two of which, at least, are entirely new.

My colleagues will undoubtedly be unanimous in judging, with me, that it is not sufficient for us to have heard such documents read once in order to form an exact opinion concerning their contents and that at least a summary examination of their text is indispensable to us before taking the exceedingly grave decision before which this assembly will find itself placed. [Applause.]

NUMEROUS VOICES. Suspension!

From VARIOUS BENCHES. Till Tuesday!

The PRESIDENT. The President of the Council has the floor.

M. PIERRE LAVAL, President of the Council, Minister of the Interior. If it is simply a question of suspending the session in order to permit the Deputies to acquire a more complete knowledge of the documents which I have just read, I declare myself in full accord with the Hon. M. Mistler. [Very good! Very good!]

If, on the contrary, it were a question of postponing the debate to another day [No! No!], I declare that the Government, being in the midst of negotiations, could not admit anything but that an immediate solution should be given to this debate.

We wish to know what the principles are which Parliament intends to establish for the conduct and accomplishment of the negotiations which are in progress. [Very good! Very good!]

The PRESIDENT. Until what hour does the Chamber wish to suspend the session?

NUMEROUS VOICES. Until 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT. There is no opposition? The session is suspended until 4 o'clock.

(The session, suspended at 25 minutes past 3, was resumed at 4 o'clock.)

RESUMPTION OF THE DISCUSSION OF THE INTERPELLATIONS ON THE TEMPORARY SUSPENSION OF THE SETTLEMENT OF WAR DEBTS

The PRESIDENT. We return to the discussion of the interpellations.

M. Margaine has the floor, in order to develop his interpellation.

M. MARGAINE. My colleagues will be kind enough to permit me, in the interests of clarity, to which I am particularly attached, to define in the most precise manner possible the position which I wish to take in this debate.

I will not examine the basis of the proposal of Mr. Hoover. Just as Mr. Hoover can do nothing without his Congress, so the French Government, since the Young plan is the result of a law, can do nothing without Parliament. I will, then, wait for the proposed legal bill in order to discuss the basis.

What I should like to examine to-day is the entirely novel situation resulting from the abrupt intervention of Mr. Hoover. There are, to begin with, surrounding that intervention, particular circumstances, certain obscurities, which I hope the Government in time will be so good as to undertake to elucidate.

The ambassador of the United States called Tuesday evening to state to the President of the Council that there had been no discussion preliminary to the intervention of Mr. Hoover. If the heads of states have sometimes a language which is somewhat brutal, diplomats, on the other hand, have a language which is particularly flexible. For, indeed, there are certain facts which one can not do otherwise than to underline and which do not completely harmonize with such a declaration.

Mr. Mellon disembarked in England on the 16th. The following morning he took care to make a declaration in which he stated that he was making a purely private journey, his only object being to pass some days with his son, a student at the University of Cambridge.

Nevertheless, that same day the official newspaper—I may well call it that—of the Labor government, the Daily Herald, explained that the American minister had come to Europe because Mr. Hoover was convinced that it was necessary to do something in regard to what concerned the war debts if one wished to avert a collapse disastrous for American financial interests.

The paper added that Mr. Hoover had in mind the idea of a suspension for two years of all payments of reparations and war debts. As this subject had been abundantly treated at Chequers between the English and the German ministers, it seems to me impossible that there had not been, between Chequers and the departure of Mr. Mellon, negotiations, communications, between the American Government and the English Government. The least that one could say is that the facts show that the newspaper, the Daily Herald, was particularly well informed.

On the other side, Mr. Mills, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, saw the ambassador from England to the United States on the morning of June 20. It was after this visit that he returned to see Mr. Hoover and that the communication was made. I have difficulty in believing that the ambassador from England was summoned at that moment in order to be advised of a matter of which he knew not the first word, after the communications whose certitude I have just made manifest.

Consequently, for my part, until proof of the contrary—and I will presently return to it—there were, in regard to the facts which have surprised us, conversations covering 20 days or so between the English and American Governments.

Contrary to what evil-intentioned characters have claimed, Mr. Hoover is far from being an impulsive person. He is a man whose character is well known. He studies much; he reflects much. All his past is the proof of it. If he has placed France before an accomplished fact, it is because he was told that it would be necessary for him so to act in order to succeed quickly and well.

But Mr. Hoover has done much more than that, and he has certainly not done it lightly: He has broken with the traditional policy of the United States. Permit me to emphasize the importance of such an attitude on the part of the President of the United States.

The American, the man in the street, does not trouble himself with questions of external policy. For him Europe is a small continent in which little nations, so numerous that one can not remember all their names, engage in rivalry, are jealous of one another, and fight, instead of bringing themselves into agreement as the States of the great Republic of the United States have done.

The man in the street is satisfied, so far as external policy is concerned, to know that his Government is remaining faithful to certain doctrines which I will summarily recall: The Monroe doctrine, the doctrine of Washington, the doctrine of John Hay.

Quite recently the Government of the United States, with a certain solemnity, on several occasions, declared that it would not concern itself in European affairs. Permit me to recall some of the circumstances in which this affirmation has been made.

When the Europeans asked the Government of the United States to have itself represented at the Genoa conference, the American Government officially replied that it did not wish to take cognizance of the affairs of Europe.

In 1922, when Lord Balfour sent the well-known note in which he proposed the annulment of war debts, the American Government replied that the affairs of Europe did not concern it; that the states of Europe had, to America, certain debts of an exclusively commercial character and that it would discuss them with each of the countries separately.

I can not admit that the executive power of a country which is attached to such an extent to traditional doctrines could have overturned all its traditions simply because Mr. Mellon, making a pleasure journey, had a conversation, by accident, with Mr. MacDonald. No. There is—let us say it and let us know how to see it—something quite different.

Besides the man in the street of whom I have been speaking, there are American business men who have dealings with Europe and, above all, with Germany, and who, since a very short time ago, have had serious reasons for disquietude.

In the United States itself there have been some characteristic occurrences, with which the press has concerned itself and of which I shall permit myself to cite some examples showing that in that country there is an internal evolution which is not without a certain gravity.

All these events, of which I shall cite some, have been set forth by the Democratic press.

Recently in the Pittsburgh basin at Westland a thousand striking miners fought with mounted police. A policeman was beaten. His comrades fired. Two miners were wounded.

At Ellsworth a veritable battle took place between the miners and the police of the coal companies. The women and children fought with particular fury.

In Kentucky, at Evarts, miners and mine police had a pitched battle. There were killed on one side and on the other.

In the State of West Virginia 1,500 miners came to Charles Town and marched through the streets, demanding bread for their children.

The Democratic press has seized upon these facts. It denounces the activities of the magnates of the industry, and since his name is spread throughout its columns, I may well remark that at their head it inscribes Mr. Mellon.

It was necessary for the United States that this situation should not grow worse, and it would have grown worse if in Germany events had entered upon an acute phase. It is at bottom the German situation which is the origin of everything.

I shall not return to the explanations given in this very place at the end of 1929, before the Government left for The Hague, when we put it on its guard against the constitution of a German-American industrial bloc, which was beginning to take on a certain solidity.

Germany, thanks to the formation of this bloc, made important appeals to American capital. The statistics show us that from 1926 to 1930 the public emissions of Germany abroad—almost all in America—attained the sum of six milliards and a half of reichsmarks, and this sum does not include the direct investments of Americans in German industry.

I find, in the same statistics, that in 1928 the total of foreign capital invested in that manner in Germany was four milliards two hundred and fifty millions of reichsmarks; in 1929 two milliards seven hundred and fifty millions.

Certain American financiers some months ago began to be alarmed by this constant outflow; their apprehensions are revealed in the fact that in 1930 the capital funds thus placed in Germany barely attained the sum of half a milliard.

On the other hand, Germany has made a great deal of noise about her budgetary difficulties. One saw M. Hilferding give way to M. Moldenhauer, then M. Moldenhauer give way to M. Dietrich, always because of the impossibility of establishing a budget, all this in the space of eight months. In spite of all these changes the budget could not be established save by making use of article 48 of the constitution of Weimar; there was a legal decree on the 1st of August, 1930, another on the 1st of December, 1930, and a third quite recently. All these facts have powerfully shaken the confidence of the Americans.

Just at the moment in which Mr. Mellon arrived in England the Reichsbank proceeded to enormous sales of gold and of exchanges. It sold in the first fortnight of June one milliard fifty millions of reichsmarks, keeping only one milliard six hundred millions; the legal reserve of the Reichsbank was very close to being reached.

During these same days in Berlin panic reigned. In the banks one sold, not banknotes—they had no more of them—but promises of banknotes to be delivered in a fortnight.

All this caused superficial observers to believe that Germany was struggling in the midst of grave budgetary difficulties. I say "superficial observers," for if the Americans had given themselves the trouble to read over the reports of their compatriot, Mr. Parker Gilbert, notably the last, which is of May, 1930, they would there have seen the affirmation, many times repeated, that the Germans will put order into their budget when they wish. [Very good! Very good!] But they do not wish it yet, because in order to make an end of the payments of the war debts it is necessary that their budget should remain in disorder. [Applause on the left, in the center, and on the right.]

M. LIONEL DE TASTES. It is useful to recall it.

M. MARGAINE. One speaks much in order to impress the world of the considerable of German unemployed.

Consider what happens in the German villages. The children do not work with their parents, as is the case in France. They always go to work for a neighbor; exchanges are made and the young people are engaged by a contract of labor. They are salaried, only the salaries balance each other. When they return home, the work in the fields being finished, they are unemployed. This makes up a certain number. [Various movements.]

Consider, on the other hand, building workers. At all times in Germany these workers have never worked in the winter, even on the interior of houses, and their salaries have always been calculated in such a manner that in winter they might live on their reserves. To-day these are among the unemployed.

The Germans make a great matter of their figure of 5,000,000 of unemployed. I am sure that when they come to regard it more closely they will immediately reduce it by a million or a million and a half at least.

But all this Germany does not intend to change. For, if, underneath, she is tranquil, by this means she disquiets the world; and we perceive that she does so.

Let us then take into account the fact that the economic situation of Germany is, at bottom, excellent.

The balance of German foreign trade is characterized, in the course of these last years, by a permanent active surplus. Of a total volume of business of twenty-two milliards three hundred millions of reichsmarks in 1930, the importations represent ten milliards three hundred millions, the exportations twelve milliards, in which are included the reparations in kind, for a sum of seven hundred millions. With reference to 1929 there is certainly a slight lowering of exportations—twenty-six milliards eight hundred millions—but, on looking closely, one sees that this diminution is due to the lowering of prices and that the diminution of quantities is excessively small, contrary to what is taking place in almost all the industrial countries.

The part which has diminished least among the importations is that of manufactured products. This is a result contrary to that which is reported in all the other industrial countries.

In 1931, from the very first months, the rising movement of German exportations began again. In the month of January, 774,000,000 of reichsmarks; in February, 778,000,000 of reichsmarks; in March, 867,000,000 of reichsmarks. The increase affects especially manufactured products: January, 575,000,000 of reichsmarks; February, 591,000,000 of reichsmarks; March, 662,000,000 of reichsmarks.

Germany, in spite of the world crisis, has attained the second rank among the exporting countries of the world, passing England, and she is not far from having first place.

Where, then, does she sell all the products which she exports? She sells them, above all, in three countries: England, Holland, and France. The United States comes far behind. The third country, France, buys from the Germans to the extent of 1,149,000,000 of reichsmarks; the United States to the extent of 685,000,000 only.

Where, then, does Germany buy all she needs in order to work? From us? Not at all. She buys from the United States.

For importations the United States is at the head with 1,307,000,000 of reichsmarks. England comes next, but far behind, with 639,000,000 reichsmarks.

Thus Germany, with an industry always more prosperous, sells to Europe, buys from the United States. It is natural enough that the United States should concern itself in a particular manner in regard to her situation.

For that country, before committing yourselves, understand well that, at bottom, there is nothing to fear. Her foundation is solid—it is of rock. That which is floating is appearances, and they will disappear when she wants them to. [Applause from the left, from the center, and from the right.]

Her industry is the best equipped. Her trade is the best organized, technically. For her economic storms are only transitory.

But she has sworn, first of all, not to pay reparations; next, to rectify her eastern frontiers. You will not bring her out of that idea. [Applause from the same benches.]

I have said—for I am convinced of it—that there has been, at least in the general outlines, concert between England and Germany unknown to us.

Why, then, has England, our ally, our faithful ally, taken this position?

Whatever our Government may have said concerning it, in the course of a recent interpellation, the Anschluss was not, at bottom, considered as a catastrophe by England. England is playing her accustomed game—to maintain balance between the nations. She does not care to have one nation surpass the others too much. At bottom, the Anschluss was a perspective which she was willing to contemplate.

Only in regard to this performance—I do not wish to call it either a drama or a comedy—something particular took place.

You have all heard talk of the very grave crisis of the Kreditanstalt.

I do not wish to enter to-day into too many details. Some other day, I hope, the Chamber will give me permission to show that the gravity of the crisis of the Kreditanstalt does not rest only in the fact that a financial establishment has suffered passing difficulties but in the fact that Austria, as she is constituted, can not live. This must be said. [Very good! Very good! from various benches.]

However it may be, there was a crisis in the Kreditanstalt.

I heard the Minister of Foreign Affairs say from this tribune that it was necessary in this matter to take account of the fact that all financial centers depend upon one another and that the crisis of the Kreditanstalt could not in any way leave us indifferent.

I note with satisfaction that our financiers here in Paris are at least a little better informed and that they did not attribute to that event the dangers for France in which our minister seemed to believe.

When our Government asked them not to agree to lend their support in order to save the bank except on condition that Austria should reassure us in regard to her intentions concerning the German-Austrian customs union, they replied that that was the most natural thing in the world and they very firmly and very patriotically took that position.

Unfortunately England did not agree that one should make the abandonment of the project for an Austro-German customs union a condition of the saving of the Kreditanstalt, and, in order to settle the matter, she took upon herself alone the burden of putting the bank back on its feet, but she found out by experience that it would cost terribly dear, more dearly than she had expected.

The Bank of England on the 18th of June made to the National Austrian Bank, in order to sustain the Kreditanstalt, an advance of 150,000,000 schillings, or £4,286,000. Unfortunately for her, she was to discover that, on the one hand, it was very difficult for her to maintain for a long time that lending position, and, on the other hand, that even that sum, considerable as it was, would not be sufficient, for the engagements of the Kreditanstalt represented from 800,000,000 to 1,000,000,000 of schillings; that is to say, from £24,000,000 to £30,000,000.

This burden which the English attempted to assume alone in order to hinder us from accomplishing our object bore heavily upon them; they were, naturally, not grateful to us for it, and it was not with displeasure that they saw impending an incident in which we would find ourselves placed in a disagreeable position; thus they awaited events tranquilly, taking care to say nothing to us concerning them.

Here, then—and I must excuse myself for having taken so long—is the description of the European setting at the moment when the proposal of Mr. Hoover arose abruptly.

All in all, we are asked to deprive ourselves of important resources which are an appreciable element in our budget, but there is in that an aspect which I do not wish to take up until we are faced with a legal project.

What I derive from the reply of the President of the Council is that we are yielding. Very well. Only we yield very often, and it would perhaps be time to think of stopping.

And I will permit myself to say to the President of the Council although it is too late, since he has already replied to the United States, that I should have preferred to see a prejudicial question put to Mr. Hoover: Is the United States, yes or no, disposed to return to involve herself in the affairs of Europe? [Lively applause from the left, from the center, and from the right.]

If yes, let them send an official delegate; we will enter into discussion. If not, let them say so once and for all. Because—I ask permission to state my whole thought [Speak! Speak!]—it is not possible for us to remain exposed every four years, when a presidential election is approaching, to interventions of this kind. [Lively applause from a large number of benches.]

Oh, gentlemen, I know well that there is the immense service which the head of the United States says he has rendered to Europe. He has saved Germany from certain collapse, in which, evidently, a good part of Europe would have been involved.

But from where did that threat of collapse come? From the fact that Germany has been living for some years past on the short-term credits which the financiers of New York have been so good as to grant her, and the danger has come from the fact that these same financiers have withdrawn those credits in enormous amounts.

M. HENRI PATENOTRE-DESNOYERS. There is the truth.

M. MARGAINE. Well, could not Mr. Hoover, the head of the United States, have begun by asking the American financiers to stop the enormous withdrawals they were making? [Applause from the left, from the center, and from the right.]

After all, it is the affair of the United States. They should, perhaps, have been able to begin by acting at home.

And even since, in letting things proceed normally, the United States receives important payments from Europe, Mr. Hoover might, perhaps, have been able to use these payments for loans to Germany. [Very good! Very good! from various benches.] Only, in the United States, a gesture of that kind would not have been enjoyed in the same manner. [Applause.]

So much for to-day. Will you permit me to examine what will happen to-morrow?

Herr Bruening, we are told, is coming to Paris. So much the better! The more we have frank conversations with our neighbors the better it will be. [Applause.]

I imagine willingly enough the sense of these conversations. Herr Bruening is going to explain the situation of his country. He will say that the war, the revolution, the occupation of the Ruhr have caused capital to disappear in Germany.

M. HENRI PATENOTRE-DESNOYERS. There is still enough for the construction of cruisers.

M. MARGAINE. While there is, he will say, so much available capital in the world, she lacks current funds.

He will explain that she can not find capital otherwise than at short term unless she lives in a good understanding with France, because then the world would feel itself reassured.

What shall we reply to Herr Bruening? We will speak to him of Poland [Very good! Very good!]; we will tell him that the manifestations to which Germany has lent herself in regard to that country in the neighborhood of her frontiers are giving rise to profound trouble there, that this trouble spreads throughout the whole of Europe, and that it is because of this very trouble that the world does not feel itself secure; that Germany can not find long-term credits.

I hear the answer of Germany. She will object that if, in the question of Poland, there were for the Germans only a question of national pride, one could still come to the end of it. But she will represent that, unfortunately, there are material questions which themselves keep constantly alive that sentiment of national pride.

Herr Bruening will tell you that the city of Danzig was formerly the natural outlet of eastern Pomerania and that it is now irremediably separated from it.

He will tell you that not only does Danzig on her side see her situation profoundly altered but that on another side—and thanks to French capital—Poland is building at Gdynia a new harbor which will end by ruining the city of Danzig.

He will tell you, again, that the fishermen of the coast of eastern Pomerania formerly supplied the Catholic population of Poland and that now they no longer have any customers save the Protestants of Germany, who hardly eat any fish, so that they are reduced to black poverty. And thus you will be led to see that there are these comprehensive questions, European questions. You will approach others, you will make the tour of them, and everywhere you will run against the obstruction of European questions. Would it not be better to begin at once by examining a European organization, of which M. Briand first spoke, but which, for reasons I do not wish to analyze, he has not been able to realize?

I have been very much struck by the remarkable results which the ministers of the states of central Europe obtained when, in their distress, they met in a series of conferences which lasted only three months, which were terminated at Warsaw, and which achieved the result that each of the governments recognized the necessity of organizing the exportation of its agricultural products and immediately succeeded in it.

Only, in these conversations they were not embarrassed by a secretariat general, thinking, hindering, composed of functionaries who were paid their weight in gold. They did not invite, in order to ask their opinion, representatives of Japan, of Chile, of China, and of Peru. [Very good! Very good, from the right.] They talked between themselves, between men who are putting their affairs in order.

Let us do the same for the affairs of Europe. Let us understand ourselves directly, in silence. I may dare to say, I will even go so far as to say, renouncing noisy acclamations, let us undertake simple and practical conversations. It is only thus that we shall be able to obtain the peace of Europe.

And if the journey of Herr Bruening can only end in this result, gentlemen, we shall be able to felicitate ourselves upon it. [Lively applause from the left and on numerous benches. The orator, returning to his place, receives felicitations.]

The PRESIDENT. M. Louis Dubois has the floor, in order to develop his interpellation.

M. LOUIS DUBOIS. Gentlemen, I have asked to interpellate the Government on the attitude which it expects to take in regard to the American proposal relative to war debts.

The Government has made a first reply to the American proposal. It is not my intention to study that reply, which, in a certain measure, would be of the nature of giving myself satisfaction.

My intention is to place as clearly as possible before the Chamber and before French public opinion—I do not dare to say world public opinion—the question of the Young plan and German reparations as it presents itself at the present time.

What does President Hoover ask of us? What does he propose?

Knowing the difficulties in which Germany is struggling, financial difficulties and not, as M. Margaine has just demonstrated in a remarkable manner, economic difficulties, financial difficulties in which his American nationals were gravely interested, President Hoover, penetrated, I doubt not, by sentiments much more elevated and very generous, inspired by his passion for universal public welfare and for peace, makes certain proposals to Europe.

He declares himself prepared to give up for the benefit of Germany the amount of the payments which she makes, for the account of her European creditors, to the Bank for International Settlements, and which it pays to the United States in order to extinguish the war debts of the former associates of that country. He proposes this for one year only.

It is a gesture, to consider it only as a gesture, which is undeniably generous. He does not make it, however, without asking from Europe, particularly from France, a return.

Germany, he tells us, pays important sums, some of which come to me, America, some of which remain in Europe, all under the head of reparations.

I ask that all the creditors of Germany, for the total amount of their credits and for one year, give up receiving these sums from Germany, who, thus relieved of the burden of her war debt, will be able to return to the financial prosperity which is lacking to her at the present time.

That is the thesis of President Hoover. I do not wish to study it or to discuss it. I ask myself simply what the repercussion of a consent given to the thesis of President Hoover and to his proposals may be for us, as much from the financial point of view as from the political point of view. [Very good! Very good!]

In order to expound the question clearly and to bring out the essential principles which are at stake, it is indispensable to go back a little. It will not be long. [Interruptions on the extreme left and on the left. Applause on the right and in the center.]

The Young plan is an accomplishment. One can not understand it unless one knows what preceded. And we should keep present in our memory in order to judge the situation and the concessions which are asked of us.

For the origin of the Young plan, it is necessary to go far back.

In 1914, the invasion of Belgium, in violation of the treaties of Belgian neutrality; the war during four years, accompanied by formidable and, to a large extent, systematic destruction on the part of Germany [applause]; the treaty of peace of Versailles; the message from President Wilson of the 8th of January, 1918, specifying the evacuation of the invaded regions of Belgium and France and their restoration, a message followed in reply to an interallied memorandum, by the declaration of November 5, 1918, from Mr. Lansing, American Secretary of State, speaking in the name of President Wilson, confirming again the fact that Germany, in any case, should repair the material damage done in the invaded countries; clauses of the armistice of November 11, 1918, clause 9: "Reparation of damage"; finally, the treaty of peace, Parts VIII and IX, establishing the obligation of Germany to pay for the damages which the allied nations, especially Belgium and France, had been the victims of, through her action.

The treaty of Versailles, Parts VIII and IX: "Reparations and financial clauses," articles 232 and the following define the damages which should be repaired.

Here I will permit myself to call to your attention, in passing, the fact that the word "reparations" in the treaty has regard, without distinction, to the payment of damages to goods and damages to persons, these last taking the form, most generally, of pensions to assist the wounded and mutilated, the former soldiers, or their dependents.

The amount of these damages for which Germany was responsible was fixed, according to the terms of the treaty, by a commission called the Reparations Commission April 27, 1921, not at the London conference, as it is unceasingly repeated, but by the Reparations Commission itself at Paris, after a very detailed study, at 132 milliards of gold marks—802 milliards of present francs—which by the terms of the treaty should have been paid in 30 years.

You will say to me: "A fantastic figure," and so forth. That is not the question.

That is the amount by virtue of the treaty of the German reparations debt, and that is the initial figure of that debt.

Then the manner in which Germany was to discharge it was established. This was the schedule of payment called that "of London," which was, in fact, more or less elaborated at London, but which was equally established by the Reparation Commission and notice of it was given to Germany by the said commission at Paris May 5, 1921.

The schedule of payments provided for very substantial payments by Germany, the delivery by her of bonds, of obligations capable of being negotiated. The annuity, which was to vary according to the extent of the exportations of Germany, would have been actually in the neighborhood of 5 milliards of gold marks.

You know what became of this schedule of payments and of the obligations of Germany. Repeated defaults on the part of Germany, occupation of the Ruhr, international difficulties, Dawes plan, and London conference.

The Dawes plan lightened considerably the obligations of Germany. Without determining their number the annuities were established as very moderate in the beginning and becoming fixed, from 1928–29, at the figure of two thousand five hundred millions of gold marks, which was susceptible to increase later, according to a certain indication of prosperity.

You know that Germany discharged her obligations during the first years, in which the annuity was very slight. But, from the year 1928, in which the so-called "normal" annuity was to begin to run—2,500,000,000 of gold marks—Germany protested so strongly that, on the 16th of September, 1928, at Geneva, the constitution of a committee of experts charged with the duty of examining again the problem of reparations was decided upon. This was the Young committee, on which the United States, in the person of her representatives, and particularly its president, Mr. Young, played one of the most important rôles.

From this came the Young plan, which, by virtue of the very mandate given to the committee and by virtue of The Hague accords, constitutes the "complete and definitive settlement of the problem of reparations."

From the financial point of view, the Young plan appears as follows:

Germany is to discharge her reparations debt in 59 annuities paid into the coffers of the Bank for International Settlements, the trustee for her creditors.

The figure of 59 annuities was chosen to fit the number of annuities remaining to be paid to the United States of America and to England for the settlement of their war debts due from their former allies and associates.

Thirty-seven annuities are of a mean value of 1,988,000,000 of reichsmarks—once and for all, I will recall the fact that the value of the reichsmark is 6.8 francs at par—and 22 annuities are of a mean value of 1,564,000,000 of reichsmarks.

For the moment, there is no question except as regards the 1931–32 annuity, but, before speaking of it, it is indispensable to lay stress on a particular point, the crux of the question which is to be placed before you; that is, the very clear distinction which was established for the first time in the debt of Germany, one part corresponding to the partial reparation of the damages done to property, otherwise said to be for the restoration of the invaded and devastated regions.

This was the first time that a kind of priority was thus established to the benefit of debts relative to reparations properly so called. I shall return to it presently, in a few words, in order to show you the full significance of this decision, which was taken not only by the reporters of the Young plan but by the governments met at The Hague in the month of August, 1929, and in the month of January, 1930.

How, then, is the Young annuity divided?

In reality there are two annuities; the one called "conditional," the other called "unconditional."

"Conditional" annuity—that is to say, subject to being suspended—in stated conditions, whether for the transfers to the creditors in foreign exchanges, or even, in conditions equally stated, for the payment in reichsmarks.

"Unconditional" annuity, payable in foreign exchanges and not, in any case, subject either to suspension of transfer or to suspension of payment.

The "unconditional" annuity is 660,000,000 of reichsmarks a year during 37 years, and even, if the letter of the plan is observed, during the 59 years.

Of these 660,000,000 of marks France receives 500,000,000 of marks. I will say at once that from the 660,000,000 there must be deducted the service of the annuity of the Dawes loan of 1924; that from the share of France, 500,000,000 of marks, the service of the annuity of the Young loan contracted by Germany in 1930, of which a part was placed in France in accordance with her rights in the mobilization of the unconditional part, must be deducted.

How will acceptance of the proposal which is made to us by President Hoover affect us?

Before answering that question it is indispensable for me to establish the good foundation of our claims as regards the unconditional part; in other words, of the absolute right, going far back, which we have to receive that part.

One might go back, in fact, to the message of President Wilson, which established a true priority in favor of the restoration of the devastated regions; to the Lansing declaration of the month of November, 1918, which confirmed this point, defining it clearly.

One might take up various articles in the treaty of peace:

"ART. 232. * * * The allied and associated Governments require in any case, and Germany accepts the obligation, that all the damages caused to the civil population of each of the allied and associated powers and to their property during the period in which that power was in a state of war with Germany by the said aggresion by land, by sea, and by the air shall be repaired * * *."

"ART. 235. In order to permit the allied and associated powers to undertake at once the restoration of their industrial and economic life, while awaiting the definitive established of the total of their claims, Germany will pay, before the 1st of May, 1921, 20 milliards of gold marks * * *."

The twenty milliards of gold marks have not served for that at all. But it is none the less a right which is written in the treaty.

The same article 235 refers to annex 2, which, in paragraph 12, specifies:

"* * * In order to facilitate and to pursue the immediate restoration of the economic life of the allied and associated countries, the commission, as provided in article 235 * * *."

Article 237, a vital point which seems to have been forgotten until the Young Plan:

"The successive payments * * * made by Germany to satisfy the claims above stated shall be divided by the allied and associated Governments according to the proportions fixed by them in advance and founded in equity and the rights of each * * *."

It is here that an absolute priority should have been specified in favor of the damages to property, of the restoration of the devastated regions. [Very good! Very good!]

That priority was imposed in an absolute manner, even financially.

Consider the situation of the invaded countries, of the countries on the soil of which during four years the war was waged.

There was there a right all the more absolute because the north and the east of France had served, not only for Germany but equally for our Allies, as the field of battle, and thus the sufferings and devastations which we endured in the common interest were spared to our Allies. [Applause from the right.] There, then, was the beginning of a priority.

But there was another reason, a reason of a financial character. These regions, as President Wilson said, as the treaty of peace said, it was necessary to restore immediately. It was indispensable, not only for the prosperity of the invaded countries but for justice; and even to the interest of Europe and of the world. It was necessary to restore them immediately; to lay out immediately, in consequence, the necessary sums. This is what we have done.

While it is only with a long maturity and by annuities extending over a great number of years that damages to individuals are repaired, in regard to damages to property, on the contrary, there was an obligation for the immediate restoration of the devastated regions. That is why a priority was imposed for the reparation of damages to property.

Why was that priority not stated at the time of the treaty of peace and of the first conferences which followed it?

To answer that question would lead me too far afield. Various interests intervened. Belgium has obtained satisfaction in part. France has found herself injured, and all the more gravely injured because the debt of Germany has been diminished. If Germany had paid within 30 years, as the treaty stipulated, the total amount of her debt, one would not perhaps have been able to examine it too closely. We would have received substantial sums from the very first years. You know that that was not the case, since on the eve of the application of the Young plan, under the heading of reparations, we had not yet received one sou from Germany. All her payments had been assigned to the payment of certain advances made by the Allies other than ourselves to Germany; to the payment of the expenses of the army of occupation; to the payment of reparations, for example, to Great Britain. But we had not at that time received one centime under the heading of reparations.

And nevertheless how many milliards had we not already spent!

Let us see now what the Young plan assigns to us.

But perhaps a part of the Assembly is about to manifest some impatience.

Undoubtedly the greater number of our colleagues know by heart the texts and figures of the Young plan, but the public does not know them, and it is indispensable to let it know them. [Interruptions on the extreme left.] Perhaps there are even some among you who do not know them. [New interruptions on the extreme left.]

FROM THE EXTREME LEFT. We have never heard them.

M. LOUIS DUBOIS. You have not heard them for the very good reason that it was not possible at the time of the discussion of the Young plan for the speaker who is now on the tribune to expound his manner of looking at the Young plan and its economy. [Applause on the right.]

The Young plan comprises, in reality, two parts: A report of the experts and a series of annexes.

This is how, in their report, the experts express themselves in regard to the unconditional part of the German annuity:

"ARTICLE 33. At this moment it is equally admitted that the possibility of accepting annuities inferior to those which were established by the Dawes plan depended upon the certitude and the facility with which the creditors might commercialize obligations withdrawn thenceforth from the influence of politics."

"ARTICLE 89. Of the annuities above mentioned, the amounts stated hereafter shall be unconditional; that is to say, payable in foreign currencies, by means of equal monthly installments, without any right of suspension whatever: Six hundred and sixty millions of reichsmarks a year, the sums which the service of the German external loan of 1924 requires being included therein."

That is, 660,000,000 less 48,000,000—612,000,000, the actual total of the unconditional annuity.

"Article 115. The part of our task which was not the least difficult was to determine the sum which Germany might immediately undertake to pay under the heading of the definitive unconditional obligation. One can not establish in advance with precision the moment at which the difficulties of proceeding to the transfer in foreign exchanges may appear. However, great care has been taken to remain so far below that limit that all possibility of error is eliminated."

It is not only in the report that this point is made; it is also made in the special annexes which are attached to it.

Notably, this is what Annex III, article 137, states:

"The sums corresponding to the service of the interest and to the amortization of the mobilizable and mobilized fractions of the annuity coupons shall be paid to the Bank for International Settlements by the German Reich, without any reservation; that is to say, on its sole responsibility. The financial service of these mobilizable or mobilized fractions shall constitute a definitive international obligation, absolute and unconditional in the financial sense of the word." [Applause from the center and on the right.]

And The Hague accord of January 20, 1930, which adopts in its entirety the Young plan, report, and annexes, with some slight differences, this accord, in its first article, specifies that "the experts' plan of June 7, 1929, together with this present agreement and the protocol of August 31, 1929 (all of which are hereinafter described as the new plan), is definitely accepted as a complete and final settlement, so far as Germany is concerned, of the financial questions resulting from the war.

"For that acceptance * * * the German Government undertakes, as regards the creditor powers, the solemn obligation of paying the annuities provided for by the new plan in conformity with the stipulations it contains."

You know of what these stipulations consist for the unconditional part.

The matter is so important, the engagement made by Germany is so vital and so definitive, that it is even reproduced on the certificate of debt of the Reich.

Here are the terms of Annex III of the accord of The Hague of January 20, 1930, Article 4, first paragraph:

"The sums corresponding to the service of the interest and to the amortization of the mobilizable and mobilized fractions of the annuity coupons shall be paid to the bank in money other than the reichsmark by the German Government, without any reservation; that is to say, on its sole responsibility."

You will please notice that the same privilege applies as well to the "mobilizable" fractions as to the "mobilized" fractions.

I continue the quotation:

"The financial service of these mobilizable or mobilized fractions of the annuities shall constitute a definitive international obligation, absolute and unconditional in the financial sense of the word." [Applause from the center and on the right.]

That being stated, the character of the unconditional part of the annuity being clearly defined and determined, as I have indicated, by the Young plan and the international accords, what is our position and what would be the effect for us, from the financial point of view, of the acceptance of the Hoover proposal?

The only question is that of suspending or adjourning—it would certainly be necessary, on this matter, that we should have some precise details—the payment of the 1931–32 annuity.

The 1931–32 German annuity is figured at 1,685 millions of reichsmarks. Of this amount 838.4 millions comes to France, of which 338.4 are under the conditional heading; under the unconditional heading, 500,000,000 less the service of our part of the slight amount already mobilized, 44.5 millions, which reduces the sum to be received to 455.5 millions of marks.

But it is further necessary to deduct eighty millions of marks which are indispensable to make up the sum which we owe to the English and to the Americans by way of our war debts.

For the part which comes to us under the conditional heading is not, to the extent of about this amount, sufficient to pay our part of the war debts to the English and to the Americans, and it is further necessary that we should take from our unconditional part the sum of 80,000,000 reichsmarks. [Various movements.]

So that there remains to us a substantial sum, which can be—let us speak now of French francs—represented by two thousand two hundred and eighty-three millions. In other words, for the year 1931–32 we would have the disposition of two thousand two hundred and eighty-three millions of actual francs under the heading of reparations properly so called for material damages above the sums employed for the payment of our war debts. That sum is going to fail us.

A note has been published which seems to me to be very well established, from which it appears that the French budget will only have to support a loss of one milliard nine hundred and some millions.

The budget, perhaps; but, apart from the budget, there are other payments to be made, on which I will not dwell. In reality it is 2,283,000,000 of francs which we are going to lack.

It is evident that it will be necessary to get them somewhere and our Minister of the Budget will find himself very much embarrassed. To what resources will he have recourse? This is not the moment to ask that.

Then, it has been said—and the Minister of Finance in a note has replied well enough to this objection—"You know very well that Germany was going to declare a moratorium on transfers. By that very fact you would have been obliged to make up the guaranty fund of 500,000,000 of reichsmarks; in other words, three milliards of francs, which you were to establish in order to guarantee the payment to your cocreditors of the conditional part which should be paid to them."

You know, in fact, gentlemen, that by virtue of the advantage which gave to us, but which was very largely justified, the attribution of 500,000,000 of reichsmarks of the unconditional part, we were asked, as a compensation, to answer, to a certain extent at least and to a substantial one, for the payment to our cocreditors and not to ourselves of the conditional part.

Now, there would remain for us to pay two thousand seven hundred millions to this guaranty fund. But who says that we shall not be obliged to pay them?

That which I declare, for the moment, is that already we are deprived for one year of two thousand two hundred and eighty-three millions of francs.

If next year, if even in the course of the present year, Germany comes to tell us, "In spite of all my good will, I am obliged to declare a moratorium on transfers," we would still be obliged to pay in addition to the Bank for International Settlements' 2,700 millions, or in all and in round numbers a deficit of 5 milliards of francs.

I do not wish to envisage the rest, for I fear that if on this ground we yield, be it ever so little, to Germany, who expects it, her demands will not be finished.

It is therefore indispensable that we should be very clear in regard to the matter. As M. Margaine has just shown very well, Germany is not, from the economic point of view, in the condition one would like to say she was in.

If, financially speaking, she is in a bad condition, it is sufficient to refer to the report of June 30, 1930, of Mr. Parker Gilbert to know that it is her own fault, exclusively her own fault. It is not for us to pay for the faults of Germany. [Applause from the center and on the right.]

That is why I insist, in regard to the Government, that it should be intransigent in this connection.

That, temporarily, it should grant some relief; I do not wish to say that I shall oppose that. I know nothing about that; it will depend upon the declarations that are made to us. But it is indispensable that we should maintain our imprescriptible rights, not only as regards the unconditional part but also the conditional part.

Notice that the amount in full of the conditional and unconditional annuties of the global annuity paid by Germany, represents only one-fifth of what we have spent—I do not say of what was due to us—for the devastated regions and for the pensions, without counting the interest.

As we are giving up the total of what we receive as the conditional part, in order to pay our war debts, it is only one-tenth of our expenses for the restoration of our devastated regions which we shall receive, admitting that Germany pays regularly the annuity for which the Young plan provides.

But it is not only the unconditional annuity which is necessary to us; it is also the conditional annuity, for how shall we pay the English and the Americans?

In the case of a simple suspension I know well that we also to a certain extent can suspend our payments temporarily.

But if at the end of the account Germany gets out and does not pay, shall we pay the English and the Americans?

FROM VARIOUS BENCHES. No! no!

M. JEAN FABRY. There will not be a French Chamber to vote the credits.

M. LOUIS DUBOIS. There is the question as it stands, with all its gravity, all its extent. I believe that I have submitted it clearly enough to the Chamber. [Applause from the center.]

I now ask the Government to tell us what its position will be. For the answer which it has made is not an answer to the question which I have permitted myself to put to it.

I dare to hope that the Government will know how to sustain the interests of which it has the care. [Applause from the center and on the right.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, some 14 years ago we were forced into war with the German Imperial Government by the brutal attacks of German submarines on ships carrying the American flag. We did not seek that war. We declared war only when it was forced upon us by that autocratic military power, but when once war was declared the American Government and the American people did their full part. We sent 2,000,000 soldiers over to the other side. We do not claim now that we won the war. We know of the tremendous casualties on the battlefield of our war-weary Allies; but we did turn the tide of defeat into victory, and after victory was won we asked for nothing. We asked for no reparations, no indemnities, no plunder, no conquered territory. We asked for nothing and we got exactly what we asked—nothing at all. Then we brought our troops back from the other side, having fulfilled every possible obligation that this country undertook when we went to war; and the Congress of the United States, showing the highest degree of liberality and generosity, adjusted the war debts so that we asked from Italy only 25 cents on the dollar and from France only that amount of money which we loaned her after the armistice.

Yet there are those, both in this country and abroad, who have pointed the finger of scorn at the United States and depicted us as "Uncle Shylock" demanding the pound of flesh.

There is one thing upon which we can all agree, and that is that we did not start the World War; that we had no responsibility for causing the World War. There is one other thing we can almost agree on, and that is that many of the Allies and foreign countries want to wish upon us the entire cost of the World War.

I voted for these debt adjustments because I thought they were fair and honorable and just to all concerned. I opposed cancellation then, and I am opposed to cancellation now. [Applause.]

But, my colleagues, I was in entire accord with the President of the United States when he announced to this country and to the world that he proposed a moratorium for one year on war debts and reparations in order that the young German Republic would be given a breathing spell, and not be overthrown by revolution either from the right or the left.

In my humble opinion the action of the President was absolutely necessary for the preservation of world peace and the stabilization not only of Germany but of all of Europe, and even of our own country.

We are confronted with a critical condition, with an appalling situation that exists in Germany through no fault of our own. The young Republic is sitting astride a volcano that may erupt at any moment, either to the right or to the left, and the consequences will be disastrous to the economic and political stability of the world, and possibly to all civilization.

President Hoover took a constructive step in June when he proposed an intergovernmental war-debt holiday for one year, and it is more constructive to-day and much more needed than it was then, and it should have the unanimous support of the thinking Members of the Congress of the United States, who have been given six months to consider his proposal. They have heard from their people back home. They have read the favorable comments in the press and are aware that the purpose of the moratorium is to check world depression and the spread of communism and revolution, and unless we keep faith with our guaranty given at that time to the President and support him at this time, we will be a factor, if not the cause, of bringing about the collapse of the German Republic. It is to be hoped that the war-debt holiday will save her from economic and political chaos.

At the present time there is Fascism on the right and communism on the left, like hungry wolves, ready to tear at the throat of the German Republic. Although ready to fight against each other, they are more willing to pull down the Republic. World civilization is at stake, and the action of President Hoover will go a long way to determine whether Germany shall continue to be a free, independent republic or a part of the soviet system, taking its orders from Moscow, or of a Fascist dictatorship. If we do not grant this moratorium now, we will be a party to causing this collapse in the world, and will be the financial losers as well as being losers from the standpoint of trade and commerce, and from the point of view of world peace and civilization.

I want it distinctly understood that the President of the United States has the constitutional power to negotiate treaties and also to carry on our foreign relations, and acting under that authority, he legitimately negotiated this proposal with the foreign governments which is now under consideration. When the Congress is not in session and an emergency arises in our foreign relations, the President is the sole authority that can act and must assume that responsibility.

I hold no brief for the international bankers. This is no effort to protect the international bankers. They may or may not have brought on this situation; they may or may not be responsible for mulcting the American people out of their money for foreign bonds which have depreciated by two-thirds of their value, but unless the Congress of the United States acts favorably on the proposed moratorium, it is very possible that other billions of dollars of American money will be wiped out and thousands of American investors ruined. The American people have loaned $2,000,000,000 through the international bankers to the German Government, private industries, and municipalities, and stand to lose most of it if Germany goes into bankruptcy.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] yesterday stated that since the moratorium has been granted the German people have paid to certain people $100,000,000. To whom has this money been paid by Germany?

Mr. FISH. Since the moratorium?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. FISH. I have no idea what the German Government has paid out. I know exactly what we have paid to the German Government and what the American people have paid to the German Government and private industries in that country.

Mr. PATMAN. Is the German Government making payments on its private debts to the international bankers at this time, or has it within recent months?

Mr. FISH. It has been.

Mr. PATMAN. During the last six months, since this moratorium was granted, they have been making those payments, have they not?

Mr. FISH. As far as I know; yes.

Mr. PATMAN. In other words, if we forego the collection of our debt from France and England in order that France and England may forego the collection of the debt from Germany, that is in order that Germany may pay the international bankers. Is that right?

Mr. FISH. I wish I could guarantee to the gentleman that Germany could pay its debts to private bankers and private American individuals and investors if this moratorium goes through.

Mr. PURNELL. I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I understand the gentleman has stated that these negotiations were instigated by the President under the treaty-making power. Will it be necessary, in order for the action of the President to receive governmental ratification, to have it submitted to this House?

Mr. FISH. I think that is required. Whether it be necessary under the Constitution I am not prepared to state, but that is the procedure in all of these war-debt settlements.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The Constitution, of course, provides that treaties are to be made by the President and the Senate. If this power exercised by the President is under the treaty-making power, it is not necessary for the House to consider it.

Mr. FISH. Oh, yes; it is. The gentleman knows that all of these debt settlements have to be originally negotiated by the Executive. The Executive, of course, speaks for the country in those matters, and it is up to Congress to act.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The gentleman does not claim that the President negotiated a treaty. This was not a treaty matter at all.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. But if it was not a treaty matter, was not the President entirely outside his province, and was not it an attempt to usurp the power of the legislative branch of the Government and calculated to put the Nation in a bad light with the other nations of the earth?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. That is why he called in Members of the two Houses.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. This function of the President in negotiating this moratorium, as I stated yesterday, is akin to an act of President Roosevelt.

My first official act in the Congress convened in extraordinary session back in 1903 was the ratification of the action taken by President Roosevelt in negotiating the Cuban reciprocity pact. The action of President Roosevelt in initiating that pact was akin to the action of President Hoover in taking the initiative toward this moratorium. We were called into extraordinary session to ratify that action, not because it affected the exercise of the treaty-making power of the President, but because it affected the revenues, and because this action affects the revenues of the Government the President of the United States is asking the Congress to ratify it. That is my view of the situation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He needs more than ratification from Congress. He needs authority from Congress because he has not that authority under the Constitution.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it did not affect the revenues of the Government, the President would have authority to negotiate a treaty.

Mr. FISH. I am glad that situation has developed because nobody else can negotiate with foreign countries except the President, and when he negotiated this particular settlement it was necessary that he come to the Congress, as he said himself, and get the support of the Congress. Nobody else except the President can deal with the foreign affairs of this country.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Under those circumstances would not the proper procedure be for the President to have authority from Congress in the first instance and then negotiate under authority from Congress; but congressional authority is requested, so there can be no question about the proper authority.

Mr. FISH. The President could not obtain the consent of the Congress, as the Congress was not in session. However, the President called in Democratic and Republican leaders, and he also wrote letters to the Members of the Congress and got their support for the proposed moratorium.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. You could not pass any law that way, could you?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose that a few months before Congress convened the President and Mr. Secretary Stimson had declared war on Japan, and we were now asked to ratify the President's declaration? Would the fact that the President might have called in the Republican leaders and the Democratic leaders bind the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FISH. The gentleman knows very well that the Constitution takes care of that important question.

Mr. BLANTON. And the Constitution takes care of this matter, if the gentleman pleases.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is it not a fact that the question of the gentleman from Texas was answered by the Wilson administration? Did not President Wilson and his great Secretary of State, William Jennings Bryan, declare war on Mexico, without congressional consent, and did not we take peaceful possession of their customhouses?

Mr. FISH. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] has asked a very important question and one that should be considered and discussed from all angles. I think the gentleman will agree that the President is the only one who can initiate such procedure, and that he has to come back to the House, but when the House is not in session he can use his good judgment, which in this case happens to be very good, and then come back to the House for approval, and that is all there is to this particular case.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. Granting for the moment the legality or propriety of the President's action, the gentleman from New York spoke about the responsibility of this body with reference to approving and ratifying this before the 15th. When this thing has been pending for six months, and when he might have called us into session to consider this and other important things, but did not do so, where is the impropriety in giving full consideration to these things instead of rushing into them blindly.

Mr. FISH. That question, so far as I know, has not been raised, or raised very seriously. I think it would have been much better if we could have ratified the moratorium proposal before the 15th, as we will probably force some nations, technically, to go into so-called bankruptcy because we did not ratify it before the 15th, and they will not be able to pay. But that is water over the mill. It has been stated to the country by the Democratic leaders that it will not become law by the 15th of December, and we should discuss it and debate it, as well as pass it at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Is it not true that this particular matter has been discussed in all of the newspapers of the country, newspapers of different political faith, and that Members of Congress have had ample opportunity to know what the facts are? The facts are well known, and the average intelligent American citizen would be perfectly competent to vote on this matter to-morrow without debate, so that all Members of Congress ought to be able to vote immediately.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I think if anyone is to take the responsibility for the delay it must be, of course, the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives, and they must take that responsibility, not only with foreign nations but certainly take it with the American people back home, who have very generally approved of this moratorium as proposed last June by President Hoover. If they want to delay it and consider it further, that is their right; but that right carries certain responsibility, and there are many millions of Americans who have friends and relatives in Germany who know the tragic conditions in that country and the suffering and undernourishment among the German people who will resent this delay very much. But it is not our responsibility on this side.

Now, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, we should not confuse this simple issue of creating a moratorium so that the German Republic will not fall; so that we can restore some hope in that land and no people and no country can exist without hope. Unless we act and give them a breathing spell and a postponement of these debts or reparations, then you will be partially responsible for the collapse of the German Republic, which is now facing a desperate situation with its back to the wall.

This has nothing to do with international bankers. Some time in the future I, too, may pay my respects to the international bankers, and particularly to some of the bankers in the city of New York who, through high-power salesmanship, have been dumping American money on every German municipality and in many industries to create further competition for American labor from the low-wage scale in Germany.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. FISH. The international bankers of New York have for the sake of huge commissions loaned over $2,000,000,000 of money belonging to American citizens and not $7,000,000,000, as was stated on the floor to-day, to the German Republic and to German industries, and have helped build up these industries in competition with labor in this country. They are responsible for the loss of a vast sum of money to our people which is badly needed in the United States to-day and they are more responsible than any group in America for helping to bring upon us this depression. There is nothing new about this depression. It is simply that we went crazy, money crazy, led by the big international bankers, who instead of confining their activities to the banking business went into the security business and sold bonds and stocks and caused overproduction everywhere in the United States. They are far from blameless as they seek to claim. They were out to make all the money possible while the going was good, regardless of the consequences that were bound to follow from mass overproduction of all kinds of securities practically guaranteed by big international banks. The mass overproduction of stocks and bonds naturally caused an overproduction of factories and a vast overproduction of all kinds of commodities which resulted in the inflation of 1929.

This artificial inflation against all the laws of economics was bound to collapse, and when it did the pendulum in swinging back toward normalcy went back all the way into the depths where we are now. The American people themselves, because of their extravagance, speculation, and gambling, were also responsible, but the international bankers and other bankers who sold securities upon the market instead of confining themselves to the legitimate functions of the banking business created this overproduction and are more responsible than any other group in the United States for the present depression. [Applause.]

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, as we proceed in this discussion, the influences back of this moratorium movement unfold themselves to the American people.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], who has just spoken, and who admits that he voted a few years ago to cancel 75 per cent of Italy's debt to the United States, and who is now supporting this moratorium, which means a further cancellation ultimately of more of these debts, talks about the American people being informed. Why, the Congress is not informed on this subject yet; and it seems that every possible effort is being made to keep us from becoming informed.

If I had needed any further evidence to convince me that back of this movement was the idea of canceling these debts, all my doubts would have been dispelled on yesterday by the President's message, when he asked for the reviving of the War Debt Funding Commission. Why revive the Debt

Funding Commission? There can be but one object, and that is to further reduce or cancel these foreign debts to the United States. Postpone them? This postponement talk is merely camouflage.

Mr. Chairman, why should all this come out on the eve of the visits of Grandi and Laval? Why have the statesmen of Europe been assured? All over Europe they are saying to-day that if this moratorium passes, these debts will be canceled. Why do you object to taking a little time to investigate the question in order that we may have all the facts before us?

For one, I voted against the debt funding bills. I voted against canceling one dollar of these foreign debts. I announced last June that I was opposed to this measure, because I saw behind it a well-organized movement to cancel these debts and unload them onto the American people. I am more convinced of that fact to-day than I was then. I am more convinced of it to-day than I was on yesterday.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], the spokesman of the Republican Party, or at least the administration wing of it in Congress, in his answer to me on yesterday asked the question, "Is this the progress you are going to make toward getting us back upon the road to prosperity?"

Oh, what a fallacy—trying to get the country to believe that by canceling or postponing collection of these foreign debts you would add to American prosperity. Why, these payments were to be made last July. The President has postponed them for six months, and instead of a return of prosperity conditions have grown gradually worse every day from that time to this.

The gentleman from Indiana said, "Are you going to prolong the distress of the country by reason of your inaction?"

Our inaction? The spokesman of your party intimates that by our delay we are prolonging this Republican panic. If delay prolongs the panic, why in the world did not your President call this Congress together in June and let us pass upon this question then? Why did he prolong the panic during all these long and bitter months, with a cold winter facing us, with from six to eight or ten million men out of work, with their women and children in thousands of cases without the necessities of life, by refusing to call Congress together?

But the gentleman from Indiana also say that this "must be considered first." Why first?

Oh, do you not remember two years ago when you brought in a bill here that was a dole to the big income-tax payers of America, paying back to them $160,000,000 of their taxes for the previous year, which they had already passed on to the ultimate consumer? They used the same argument, that it "must be passed first," that there could be no delay. As a result, you passed it, and you men to whom the word "dole" seems to raise such images of horror voted to give that "dole" to those large income-tax payers who had already collected it from the masses of the American people.

Another one of the fallacies of the able, distinguished, and affable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] is that he says, "We all know that our debtor nations depend upon payment by Germany to these other countries."

Why, the gentleman from Indiana ought to be better informed than that. There are 8 or 10 of these nations involved in this moratorium to whom Germany does not owe a cent. If this was going to help Germany or if that was your object, why did you include all these other nations who do not owe Germany anything, but owe these international bankers, whom the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] will take care of in his own sweet time? Why in the world did he not do it to-day? [Laughter.]

Now, another thing. I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana if he thinks this is good business ethics. If he thinks it is, I would not want him as a director of an institution to which I was obligated, or for whose acts I was responsible:

If that is true—

if Germany should become bankrupt and unable to pay her debts to the Allies, they, in turn, would have the finest excuse for not paying us.

Is that the gentleman's idea of international obligations? If Cuba owed us a billion dollars and we owed England $2,000,000,000, and Cuba had not paid us, would that be any excuse, much less the "finest excuse," for us to refuse to pay England? No, Mr. WOOD. That is not the attitude that one nation should assume toward its obligations to another.

Now, one or two things more. I asked the gentleman from Indiana why it was that we had not had prosperity already, and he said it was because of the doubt and uncertainty that grew out of the approval of these moratoriums.

Well, that carries us back to the original proposition. If that were the case, why in the world did not the President of the United States call Congress into session and relieve this uncertainty and, as I said, give us an opportunity to pass legislation that would relieve the American people from the effects of this awful panic?

Mr. MCFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Certainly.

Mr. MCFADDEN. This moratorium did not come upon us suddenly, and have not we had discussions upon it for nearly six months?

Mr. RANKIN. Certainly; I thank the gentleman for his statement. By the way, you gentlemen who did not hear the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] a while ago will do well to read it.

Now, the gentleman from Indiana made a statement which did not get into the RECORD but did get into the newspapers. He asked the question if we were ready to take the Army and the Navy to collect these debts, intimating that these debts would be repudiated.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken. I never used any language that could be construed in that way.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I made that statement.

Mr. RANKIN. Then I apologize to the gentleman from Indiana. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], the new leader of the Republican Party, made it. [Laughter.] Well, that intimation is an insult to every nation involved. That has been the stock argument of the international bankers, who are passing it around in their newspapers. I say it is an insult to the people of every country involved.

Do you think that these nations are going to repudiate their debts? Thomas Jefferson, one of the greatest statesmen of all times, said that our greatest weapon was our commerce. He was the one who advocated strenuously equal and exact justice to all nations and entangling alliances with none.

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. Was it not George Washington?

Mr. RANKIN. Washington and Jefferson, both. It was Jefferson's doctrine. He said our commerce would be the greatest weapon that we would ever have. Do you suppose that one of these countries—that France, that great power of continental Europe—would repudiate her debts in the future, and continue to repudiate them throughout the years to come and expect to maintain her trade with the United States? Do you suppose that England or Italy or Czechoslovakia or Rumania, or any other nation involved, would repudiate these debts merely because, forsooth, you refuse to grant this moratorium? No; those debts will be paid, unless the Congress of the United States cancels them—these international bankers and their spokesmen to the contrary notwithstanding.

I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] that this is a matter that should have originated with Congress. Suppose some individual owed the United States money, would you have them come and obtain a settlement from the Executive? This is a matter that involves revenue and must originate with Congress, must originate in the House of Representatives.

I have introduced a resolution, which I hold in my hand, to investigate and see who these international bankers are, who hold these international obligations, to whom they have sold them, and so forth. Let us learn the whole story. Nobody will suffer now, through waiting a few weeks or a few months. You say if we do not do it now it might be too late. Too late for whom? You don't mean that they are likely to get excited and pay these debts, do you? [Laughter.] I will tell you what you are afraid of, you are afraid that this great Ways and Means Committee as now organized will call those international bankers and all other interested witnesses in and see what is behind this movement. They fear they will investigate it thoroughly. Whenever they do and the people back at home find out what is back of this movement and what you are trying to do, there will be such a wave of protest sweeping in here from every corner of America that you are going to find very few men who will be willing to stand up and carry out the recommendations in that message, which mean, in my humble opinion, the ultimate cancellation of these foreign debts to the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak for a few minutes upon a point of privileges of the legislative branch of the Government and in a large sense of the Government. I do not want my discussion to assume a partisan aspect. The condition which confronts and the possible consequences involved demonstrate the unwisdom of the President's action without congressional authority. It was not an accident that this Government was divided into three coordinate branches. The experience of our ancestors long before our more immediate ancestors came to this continent demonstrated the wisdom of that sort of government. Experience had demonstrated that it is unsafe to trust to one person, be he king, president, or what not, all of the powers that affect people in a governmental way. At the same time experience had demonstrated that it is best to have a single executive. Therefore, in the formation of our Constitution, crystalizing the experience and wisdom of the ages, we find this division of governmental power into three coordinate branches, with their respective powers defined. The situation that may develop out of this transaction immediately under consideration demonstrates the wisdom of that arrangement and the unwisdom of the nonauthorized action of the President with regard to this particular matter. He had no authority to negotiate, much less authority to act. It was outside of his business. Neither the Constitution nor the Congress directed or commissioned him to proceed. It is perfectly evident from some of the resolutions and actions of other governments to which reference has been made that the countries abroad with whom the President negotiated understood that the President of the United States spoke for the American Government. If I am not properly advised with regard to this, I would appreciate being corrected, and I shall strike my remarks from the RECORD.

The President of the United States had no more authority to do what he did than John Smith or Bill Brown or anybody else. I am not questioning the President's motives. We are considering constitutional power and procedure. The Constitution of the United States makes the President of the United States the Executive to carry out the legislative will, regularly declared by the legislative branch of the Government. He has some additional duties. One of those additional duties is to negotiate treaties. Those treaties are negotiated by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It is not a part of the legislative branch of the Government that advises and consents, but it is the persons who happen to be the Senators of the United States Senate who consent. They act in this regard as a privy council. In this matter the President was not negotiating a treaty. In order to crystallize this negotiation into effective and binding form, approval must be had of the Congress of the House of Representatives in the first instance because it affects the revenue. If it be true, as is agreed, that approval must be had of the House, then clearly it was not a treaty that the President was undertaking to negotiate. If it is not a treaty which he undertook to negotiate, in so far as he presumed to speak for this Government, it was, in a sense at least, a usurpation of power bestowed by the Constitution on the Congress. That character of procedure is not only calculated to cause confusion and international misunderstandings but such consequences are inevitable. It may be that Democratic Presidents in times past have done this thing. I do not know.

Mr Roosevelt's name has been mentioned. It may be that Mr. Roosevelt or this man or that man or the other man who happens to be President has done that thing. That makes no difference. I am not discussing persons or parties but fundamental policies of government which ought not to be disregarded. It is the duty of the legislative branch of the Government to hold to itself those powers which the framers of the Constitution saw fit to vest in it not as a matter of pride but as a solemn duty.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LUCE. Did not Thomas Jefferson negotiate for the purchase of Louisiana?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am advised that Thomas Jefferson had the consent of Congress before he negotiated for the purchase of Louisiana, but that is not important. That would not make the procedure under consideration either proper or improper, wise or unwise. I am not discussing this matter from a partisan standpoint. It is not a matter to be opposed by me as a Democrat and defended by someone else as a Republican. It is a matter of constitutional division of governmental powers and the high duty of Members of Congress to preserve in practice respect for those divisions of power which actual experience has proven to be wise, and which were approved by the framers of our Constitution.

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield to the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am trying, as best I can, to avoid anything that looks like a partisan discussion of this great question which goes directly to the division of powers between the executive and legislative branches of the Government. This division of powers resulted from nobody's speculation. They resulted from necessity demonstrated in the actual practical operation of government. They were fixed in our system long before the Revolution. Ignoring in practice either the letter or the spirit of this basic policy in our system of government is calculated to bring hurt and we will be discredited. Suppose the House of Representatives refuses to ratify this act of the President, what will happen? The nations of the world dealing with the President of the United States have a right to presume that he is not engaged beyond his power to make effective; that he knows what he is doing.

One of the gentlemen has said that the House of Representatives and the legislative branch of the Government would be responsible to the country for the consequences that follow if this arrangement is not ratified. Now, is that a fact? If so, the President can coerce the Congress by acting without authority of the only power which can give authority, the Congress. The Constitution gives to Congress the power to act and places upon it the solemn responsibility of examination and judgment. The President is given the power to convene Congress whenever in his judgment necessity requires the Government to discharge any duty which has been allocated to Congress in the division of governmental powers; but that is all.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I think the gentleman left the impression that foreign governments have been led to believe that the action of the President was the action of the Congress, and——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I did not yield for an expression of opinion by the gentleman, but I yielded for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Well, is it not a fact that those who negotiated with the President knew perfectly well that it would have to be ratified by Congress?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I beg to direct the gentleman's attention to what I understand to have been a quotation by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], in which he quoted:

Whereas on June 20, 1931, the President of the United States of America made proposals for the suspension of international governmental debts, etc., and whereas the governments signatories of the present protocol have accepted said proposals and have agreed to apply them in part to the obligation of the German Government under the agreement signed, etc.

Which indicates very strongly that somebody thought the President was not entirely without authority to commit this Government.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman recall that in the statement issued by the President on June 20, 1931, of which I hold a copy in my hand, he used these exact words:

Subject to confirmation by Congress, the American Government will postpone all payments upon debts of foreign governments to the American Government payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1, next, conditional on a like postponement for one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts owing the important creditor powers.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes. The President was outside of the bounds limiting the constitutional duties and powers of the Executive. He was dealing with the Nation's revenue. He was acting without constitutional power or congressional authority, which he ought to have had before he acted. There is an orderly constitutional way to do things, and when they are done that way we avoid confusion. When they are not done that way confusion and hurt results to the public interest. That is the reason why I feel it my duty to protest against that method of transacting the public business.

Congress is called on here with a time limit—the 15th of this month—within which to give approval, with the threat involved in the situation that if Congress does not within this time limit approve the action of the President then difficulty will develop internationally.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman has been very courteous. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Immediately when the President thought it well to take these steps, he called into conference a large number of the leaders of the House, from both sides, Democrats and Republicans, and consent seemed so universal that the President might well have assumed that there would not be any serious question about confirmation. I say this to the gentleman, so far as I am concerned, I am not disposed at this moment to find any fault with the majority. I do not know that much will be lost by a few days' delay beyond December 15, unless unfortunately the impression by this discussion should bring a feeling in the world that there is any doubt whatever of the action of Congress in confirming the moratorium.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Well, that is the point.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If there should be any serious doubt created, it might affect the financial situation in the entire world.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is the point. The gentleman gives force to my argument.

Now, the President puts the House of Representatives in a situation where it can not, in free conference, discuss this matter without creating a bad impression, so the gentleman states. That is the point I am trying to make, and the only point, or rather the point, made is in support of the premise that disregard of the constitutional division of governmental powers is not only confusing but dangerous. Congress can not possibly give the consideration within the time indicated which the importance of the matter requires, with the charge, the threat, involved that if it does not act—that is not all, if it does not ratify the unauthorized negotiations of the President by the 15th, "it might affect the financial situation of the entire world."

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas two additional minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Now, in conclusion, ladies and gentlemen, that is the point I am trying to make, and the only point I am trying to make. The statement of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] and other statements made here indicate that the House is hampered in the consideration and discharge of a great constitutional responsibility by reason of the action of the President, acting without authority first had from the legislative branch of the Government. The point I am making is not with regard to this President only, but all Presidents to come, that when a matter of this importance especially is to be considered, requiring the approval of the Congress, the President of the United States ought, in the first instance, have the approval of the Congress and act under the authority of those who alone can give him the authority to act. That is the method contemplated by the Constitution. That is the method most calculated to preserve good government, harmony, and effective teamwork at home and respect and confidence abroad. What I have said was not for the purpose of criticizing the President, but to defend and insist upon respect for the division of governmental powers created by necessity, justified by experience, approved by those who have examined the value of representative government, and finally wrought into our constitutional structure as its most fundamental and basic policy.

I thank you very much. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas yields back one minute.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS].

Mr. CROSS. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I am not going to make any partisan speech. I feel this is a question of great moment. We Congressmen here represent our 120,000,000 people. I think this is a question that ought to be weighed carefully and upon the facts. The question is whether this Nation should postpone the debt that is due it from the European countries which borrowed from it during the war.

What did this Nation get out of the war and what did the nations that now ask us to postpone that debt get out of the war? The European Allies in the war got territories and provinces from Germany that amount to more in area than all the territory east of the Mississippi in these United States, with Arkansas and Iowa thrown in. In addition to that they got all the merchant ships which Germany had with a tonnage in excess of 1,600 tons; they got half of all the ships that Germany had with a tonnage from 1,000 to 1,600 tons, and they got one-fourth of all the small vessels belonging to Germany in addition.

The Versailles treaty provided that Italy, France, and Belgium should have delivered to them 367,000,000 tons of coal in a few years. That same treaty further provided that Germany should build for England and France and turn over to them vessels aggregating a tonnage of 1,000,000 tons within 10 years. In addition to all of that those Allies received—and I think we ought to get down to some concrete facts and not mere declarations and exclamations—in kind before the Dawes plan came into existence and after the Dawes plan came into existence more than $9,000,000,000, according to the estimates of the American Institute of Economics. Germany insists it is much higher even than that, but France puts it under. However, when you add the German and French estimates and divide them by two you will just hit about what the American Institute of Economics states it to be, more than $9,000,000,000. The reparations Germany is to pay under the Young plan would pay the European Allies about $404,000,000 this year. We are due to receive under our settlement with her $16,000,000 this year. Spread over the years we would get from Germany, all told, about $700,000,000, but the cash value is not in excess of $250,000,000.

Under the present régime there are in the so-called Young plan the conditional and unconditional payments and the unconditional payments amount to 660,000,000 reichsmarks, of which France gets 500,000,000 and Italy 42,000,000. Every time anything happens France gets a bigger share. Under the Dawes plan France got 52 per cent of all reparations; England, 23 per cent; Italy, 7 per cent; and Belgium, 5 per cent. Under the Young plan France gets 55 per cent; England, 22 per cent; Italy, 9 per cent; and Belgium, 6 per cent.

Now, we hear much about the condition of those European countries. We hear much about the distress there. Is there no distress here? Are there any more millions there who are out of work than there are here?

The money which this country loaned to those countries came from the so-called Liberty bonds. They were like so many promissory notes. They borrowed on those notes and got the money. The indorsers of those notes were every man, woman, and child in your districts. They indorsed them. You pledged them that that money would be paid back by the borrowers, and yet you, here representing them, by this act indorse those promissory notes, so that if the borrowers do not pay them, then your constituents, the indorsers, pay them.

Already we have canceled practically half of them. You know as well as I do that this is but a movement which means cancellation of those debts, for while the President in his message says that there is no connection between reparations and the debts, yet he says following that—and if he had not had a purpose why say it—that we must be good neighbors, we must only demand in proportion as their ability is to pay. But who is to determine their ability to pay? Why, a committee of the international bankers, of course. That is who is to determine it, and just as sure as we are here to-day when you grant this moratorium you have canceled the debt; you have shifted the tax burden from the taxpayers of those countries, who have already received in excess of $9,000,000,000 of reparations from Germany, who have already received territory in area of more than all the territory of this country east of the Mississippi, with Arkansas and Iowa thrown in. You have canceled those debts and you throw the burden on the indorsers to pay them, your constituents. Have we not been liberal? Did we not go when they were sorely pressed to their rescue and send 2,000,000 of our boys; and we poured out our money there as we poured out the blood of the bravest in our Nation, losing some 60,000 or 70,000 on the battlefields. And in addition have we not some 237,000 crippled and disabled? Yet not a penny did we ask.

Oh, yes, we got something out of the war. It has been hate, hate. And now there is due us this year this very thing we propose to postpone. There is due us—because I just got it from the Treasury Department—$252,000,000 plus. That is what is due us this year.

Then to hear their spiderlike diplomats, pickled as they are in the hypocrisy of Satan, sneering at us, "Are you going to demand your pound of flesh?" And this after we have displayed toward them a generosity without parallel in the annals of history, by canceling half the sums they borrowed of us in their hour of bitter need, which saved them from destruction. "Ingratitude, thou marble-hearted fiend!"

But what of their conduct? Did they demand of Germany "their pound of flesh?" Did they do even as well as Shylock and stop at a pound of flesh? No, they stripped her to the bone and then scraped the bone to the marrow. And now they have the effrontery to shake and rattle her skeleton at us and threaten even to destroy that unless we cancel the rest of what they owe us. If the last drop of the milk of human kindness in their hearts had not long since turned to gall, they would abandon their impossible and unjust demands against Germany. They hardly get home from one conference until they are asking for another and at the conclusion of each we find ourselves the losers for we can not compete with them in that diplomatic oily art "to speak and purpose not."

During the war they professed not to blame the German people, asserting on the contrary that they were merely the helpless victims of their war-lord, the Kaiser, and that it was their purpose to free them from the military yoke of their ruthless master. But who is the ruthless master now? Should they not blush with shame when they compare their conduct to the lofty example set them by America? After having stripped her of her territories, of her resources at home and abroad, they know that Germany, in her present impoverished condition can not continue to pay the vast sums which they still demand, and their doing so is but a ruse by which they hope to bring pressure upon this Congress to cancel the remaining half of the debt which they yet owe us. Had this country acted firmly and with the directness and positiveness of an Andrew Jackson and warned them that these debts had to be paid and that no quibbling would be tolerated, they would have long since ceased to harass Germany with their impossible and absurd demands and to-day instead of their contempt and hate, we would have their respect and friendship.

Will you vote for this moratorium which means that you are going to transfer it to the people of this country? I am sick of hearing all of this cry that if America does not go over there and put money into Germany's pocket, she is going bolshevik, and that will just be terrible. There are two mighty oceans between this country and Germany, yet there is but an imaginary line between Germany and some of these highjacking nations. But Germany is not going bolshevik.

Listen! Do you know what France is paying annually on her army? She has 716,000 men in her air corps, in her navy and army. I have it here from the War Department. She is paying out $2,427,038,102 annually. Think of it. If she would turn that over to this country, in two years she would have her debt paid. Listen to what the War Department says: In 1929 she jumped in her expenses and increased the army, the air corps, and the navy. She jumped again in 1930, and no doubt she will jump again this year. For what purpose? Has she any fear of the nations about her? Germany is hog-tied and helpless. Italy is no match. Spain is but a name. Russia is standing on her head, and is impotent. Why the building up of this tremendous army but that she proposes to dictate to Europe, and that she is doing by means of her army and with your money. For I have it from the Treasury Department that a few months ago, when I made the inquiry, she had $55 per capita in gold alone, when at the same time this country all told only had in circulation $38 per capita. If you cancel this debt, you enable her more fully to work her will on Europe.

I wonder how many here are familiar with the Dawes plan and the Young plan. Why, do you not know that when Germany kept staggering and it looked like she was not coming around to meet the sums of money that had been lent by the international bankers, the Reparation Commission called a committee consisting of two from England, France, Germany, and Japan, and then they called on old Cal to send over two, but he wisely said, "I will not do it; this country has nothing to do with your reparations. We made a separate settlement with Germany, and it is no affair of ours." Then it was that the Reparation Committee appointed Mr. Dawes and Mr. Owen D. Young. At whose behest? Do you suppose they needed the financial brains of America—those magicianlike statisticians and financiers? No; it was simply to work in and get reparations and debts considered as if they were hooked together, and the Dawes plan starts out by saying that Germany shall pay for the year 1924 $238,000,000, and that this amount shall be increased until at the end of five years she shall be paying $595,000,000, and shall pay that through infinity.

Then it was that our international bankers loaned them money, discounted their paper, if you please, at such rates of interest that they thought at the time to clean up untold millions.

Shall your poor constituents, the indorsers of these Liberty bonds, have it put upon their backs so that these boys who are trying to make fortunes in German paper may be successful? If anybody should lose, who should it be—your constituents who indorsed that paper through you or these greedy discounters? Let your conscience answer.

Oh, we hear so much about a dole. I do not suppose any man in this Congress believes in a dole. The principle is one that is repugnant to every drop of my blood; but let me tell you, my countrymen, if you cancel these debts what is going to become of your money that is going back to England except to pay a dole? She is paying a dole to millions of her citizens. In this way you make your taxpayers pay these doles to English citizens. You are paying a dole to other nations and helping them build up tremendous armies.

The President's message whispers the fact that, perhaps, if we want to get armaments reduced we should cancel the debt or greatly reduce it. Have we got to buy Europe in order to get her to reduce her armaments? What concern is it of ours?

I am sick and tired of this Nation muddling around in the affairs of the countries of Europe or any other country. I am one who was opposed to the League of Nations. I am opposed to the World Court. [Applause.]

We are constantly being brought into their affairs, and here recently our White House has become the rendezvous of the prime ministers of Europe, with their cunning, slick ways, and our statesmen seem to be as helpless as a fly in a spider's web when they get hold of them. Oh, the flattery they pour out, and how we fall for it and knuckle to them. When will we be men? I think Bernard Shaw must have had his mind on the White House when he declared that we are a nation of boobs, so easily handled, so easily manipulated. [Laughter.]

Is there any man here who has any question about what this means? No. Hear me, my colleagues. Let Europe run her own affairs. Let us quit meddling with international agreements. Let us say to England and the rest of Europe, "You build your navies and have your armies as you see fit and we will do likewise." [Applause.] Two mighty oceans separate us. God has given us this new world of North and South America and under the Monroe doctrine we have supreme influence and control over the countries and the islands that fringe them. Let us keep away from Europe and Asia. Let us get out of the Philippines and go home. If we must have more territory, there is more territory here than we can use.

O my colleagues, think and think wisely. Do not let any President legislate for you by telegraph. [Applause.] How low is this Nation sinking when our President begins to legislate by telegraph?

O my colleagues, take the advice and follow the chart laid down by Washington, "Friendship for all nations, entangling alliances with none." [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a report of a committee of the Iowa State Bar Association provided for at its annual convention in June, 1930, of which committee I was chairman, to study and report on stabilizing the purchasing power of money.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

STABILIZING THE PURCHASING POWER OF MONEY

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, the Iowa State Bar Association at its annual convention in June, 1930, created a committee to study and report on the problem of stabilizing the purchasing power of money. The committee, consisting of C. WILLIAM RAMSEYER, chairman; F. Dickinson Letts, and Fred C. Gilchrist, all members of the Iowa bar, submitted their report to the Iowa State Bar Association at its annual convention in Des Moines, Iowa, on June 18, 1931. This report reads as follows:

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON STABILIZING THE PURCHASING POWER OF MONEY

Mr. President, members of the Iowa State Bar Association, last year this association upon the recommendation of its president, Mr. Justitce Grimm, of the State supreme court, authorized the appointment of a committee of three to study the problem of stabilizing the purchasing power of money. On this subject in his annual address he said:

"By many of the best informed it is believed if accomplished this may prove to be a great source of relief from many of the economic and social turmoils which now occasionally rock every civilized government."

Politics is defined by Webster's Dictionary as:

"The science of government; that part of ethics which has to do with the regulation and government of a nation or state, the preservation of its safety, peace, and prosperity, the defense of its existence and rights against foreign control or conquest, the augmentation of its strength and resources, and the protection of its citizens in their rights, with the preservation and improvement of their morals."

Note especially the place of "prosperity" in this definition—"the preservation of its (the nation's) safety, peace, and prosperity."

From time immemorial the government in power has been held accountable for the safety, peace, and prosperity of the people. The government is whatever the people make it or permit it to be. In the preservation of the nation's safety, peace, and prosperity the people contribute character, intelligence, loyalty, industry, and initiative; the government contributes within the limits of power conferred upon it protection, stability, and opportunity to the people to help themselves. It is true, as often stated, that the government owes no man a living; but, on the other hand, it is a function of government to maintain conditions under which no man is denied the opportunity to make a living.

In I Samuel xxii, 2, is described the gathering at the cave of Adullam under David, as follows:

"And everyone that was in distress, and everyone that was in debt, and everyone that was discontented gathered themselves unto him; and he became a captain over them; and there were with him about four hundred men."

Here are set forth the causes of revolution in a nutshell—distress, debt, and discontent—engendered by economic conditions chiefly.

The problem of the ages seems to be how to live together in organized society on a basis of economic justice and equity, which at the same time will permit and encourage the highest social, moral, intellectual, and spiritual development of the people.

In this study we are concerned with the economic phase of the problem. Our national wealth is near $400,000,000,000. It would serve no useful purpose at this time to recite facts and figures on the productiveness of our farms and factories, the efficiency of our labor, and highly developed communication and transportation systems.

The goods produced in this country and the goods which we obtain from abroad in exchange of goods of which we have a surplus give us a sum total of goods sufficient to supply the necessities and comforts of life to every man, woman, and child in the land.

In 1921 President Hoover, then Secretary of Commerce, in his report as chairman of the President's Conference on Unemployment, said:

"There is no economic failure so terrible in its import as that of a country possessing a surplus of every necessity of life in which numbers, willing and anxious to work, are deprived of these necessities. It simply can not be if our moral and economic system is to survive. * * *

"What our people wish is the opportunity to earn their daily bread, and surely in a country with its warehouses bursting with surpluses of food, of clothing, with its mines capable of indefinite production of fuel, with sufficient housing for comfort and health, we possess the intelligence to find solution. Without it our whole system is open to serious charges of failure."

Mr. Daniel Willard, president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, in an address last March on unemployment and the distribution of resources before the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce, said:

"The mere existence of the [unemployment] problem presents a serious challenge to our economic system."

After discussing our natural and humanistic resources, our productive capacity, and our surpluses, he said:

"And with all this surplus of wealth and resources we have millions, so it is said, in dire need of food and clothing—in short, more of everything to eat and wear than we can possibly use and at the same time millions of human beings hungry and cold. That is another problem, although closely related to the first, and the two problems together—unemployment and the distribution of resources—bring into question the very foundations of our political and economic system."

Here is the problem stated by two eminent authorities. It is not a new problem. It is not a problem incident to the world-wide depression. The depression merely emphasizes the existence of the problem. It is the recognized paramount problem before the American people. The recognition of the existence of a problem is the first step toward its solution. Have we "the intelligence to find solution"?

Your committee is aware of the position of some recognized authorities that the economic distress through which this country, together with the rest of the world, is now passing is due to the aftermath of the World War and our rapid scientific progress resulting in technological unemployment. The economic destruction and financial loss of the World War to date is estimated at nearly $400,000,000,000, or equal to the national wealth of the United States. The world can not pass through such an upheaval without suffering and distress for many years thereafter.

Due to our scientific progress we have witnessed since the World War greater and more rapid changes in modes of living and in agriculture and industry than has taken place in any other like period of time in history. In 1918 it took one man a whole day to make 40 electric-light bulbs. Soon thereafter there came a machine that made 73,000 bulbs in 24 hours, and each machine destroyed the jobs of 992 men. In the boot and shoe industry 100 machines take the place of 25,000 men. According to a recent report from a coal mine in southern Illinois, with a new machine used in the mine to load coal 250 miners do the work formerly done by 1,100 miners. The harvesting combine, which can be operated by a man and two boys, does away with the reaping and shocking of grain, and at the same time displaces a whole threshing crew. Instances of changes in agriculture and industry of this kind could be multiplied many times over.

These changes in industry and agriculture add to our unemployment problem. The problem may become more acute with every new invention. New industries do not create jobs as fast as new machines in old industries destroy jobs. Technological unemployment is one of the hazards of living in this scientific age. Means to mitigate this and other hazards of unemployment call for sympathetic understanding, foresight, future planning, and cooperation among employers and employees.

Now to approach more directly the subject matter of this report stabilizing the purchasing power of money and the relation of the fluctuating purchasing power of money to employment and the distribution of resources. The fluctuation in the purchasing power of money has agitated this country and the world for generations. Gold is the basis or measure of value of the leading commercial nations of the world. A study of the index number of wholesale commodity prices over a period of time will disclose that the index number rises with the increase in the gold supply and falls with the decrease in the supply of gold.

After the Civil War, from the early seventies to 1897, there was a gradual decrease in the supply of gold and a constant decrease in commodity prices. During that time we had the granger movement, the fiat-money agitation, and the free-silver issue. Whatever we may now think of the issues of those days, it must be conceded by every unbiased student that back of it all was the purpose to stabilize the purchasing power of money. As money became less in volume, its value increased, thereby reducing commodity prices and making it more difficult for those in debt to pay off their obligations.

Following 1896 gold was discovered in the Klondike, and only a year or two later South Africa poured a great stream of gold into the world's supply. This increased the money supply, and ere long there was an upward trend to the index of general prices. The condition of the debtor class was improved, and thereby was removed in a large measure the spirit of discontent, especially in the West. The increase in commodity prices was more rapid than the increase in wages, which resulted in 1910 in the beginning of a strong agitation against the high cost of living.

The index number of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics on the basis of the average wholesale prices for the year 1913 is 100. Beginning with 1914, there was an increase in the index number, which rose to 225 in 1920. After the middle of the year 1920 there began a contraction in money and credit, and the index number fell to 140 in 1921. In this inflation and deflation of the World War period other factors than the gold supply played an important part.

We appear to be in another period of diminishing gold supply. George E. Roberts in an article dated April 1, 1931, observed: "A recent inquiry conducted under the auspices of the League of Nations has developed that mining engineers over the world are in general agreement that, based on present prospects, the gold production is more likely to diminish than increase." A continued period of falling commodity prices, such as distressed the people of this country from the early seventies to 1897, must certainly be averted.

Any change in the purchasing power of money touches every kind of moral question and every kind of obligation. To every business transaction not on a cash basis there is a promise on the part of one to pay and on the part of another there is the promise to be paid. Those who promise to pay are in the debtor class and those who hold such promises to pay are in the creditor class. In the latter class are holders of life insurance, savings-bank depositors, pensioners, annuitants, wage and salary earners, owners of notes and bonds, the endowment funds of colleges and hospitals, etc. Cheap money, resulting in the rise of commodity prices, adversely affects the creditor class; on the other hand, the debtor class in time of inflation can more readily pay off the debts contracted before the inflation.

In the increase in commodity prices from 1914 to 1920 the creditors had the value of their investments and incomes more than cut in two. During the same period the debtors were enabled to pay their debts at the peak of 1920 with dollars less than one-half in value of the 1914 dollars. It is estimated that in this period by the process of inflation $60,000,000,000 were transferred from the pockets of the creditor class to the pockets of the debtor class. With the deflation of 1920 the operation was reversed in a somewhat less degree to the benefit of the creditors and to the distress of the debtors. Those who gave mortgages on real estate at the peak in 1920 had almost double the load, a few years thereafter, they had originally contracted to assume.

Says Owen D. Young:

"The proper handling of price stability is one of the most important matters facing the capitalistic system. In it will be found the roots of those maladjustments which result in unequal and unfair distribution of wealth, in unemployment, and other serious problems."

Sir Josiah Stamp says:

"A stable price level is the most bitterly practical of all questions."

H. G. Wells has said that civilization is at the crossroads; that the test of civilization is whether or not we can learn to control the purchasing power of our money.

The International Labor Conference at Geneva, May–June, 1929, in an exhaustive report on Unemployment and Monetary Fluctuations, had this to say:

It seems to be possible to declare emphatically that abrupt, or even slow but prolonged, variations in the general price level, or, in other words, disturbances in the equilibrium between production and the means of payment, play no small part in determining the alternating acceleration and retardation of economic activity, and are hence an important cause of the recurring unemployment crises which mark one phase of the cycle.

"If, then, the magnitude of variations in the general price level could be reduced, an important cause of unemployment would be rendered less potent. But is such reduction feasible? This is the vital question, to which those competent in the matter are becoming more and more inclined to return an affirmative answer."

The Stable Money Association, which has among its officers and directors leading industrial and financial leaders, economists, and statesmen, including such leaders of thought as Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes and Hon. Frank O. Lowden, in a recent statement said:

"This is a world problem. Every leader of public opinion in the world, therefore, should feel it incumbent upon him to make it his own problem.

"Responsibility for progress in the stabilization of money and credit must rest to a very large extent upon the shoulders of us in America, because we have a disproportionate share of the world's gold; and as the world's creditors we are able to draw gold from the rest of the world at our discretion; we have a closely integrated, highly organized, and widely used banking and credit system; and our statistical material is abundant; yet no one country can or should attempt to control the situation alone, and every country should assist."

From report of the committee on stabilization of money standard of the South Carolina bankers' convention, 1930:

"Unless some improvement develops in the utilization of gold, inevitably the long trend of price level must continue downward. The benefits will accrue to the creditors and the owners of fixed income-bearing securities, the losses will fall on the debtors and the producers, who must sell on a declining price level.

* * * * * * *

"Stabilization is vital to the well-being of both possessor of money and the seller of things money will buy. During a period of inflation the owner of money finds its purchasing power reduced, and during a time of deflation the seller of goods finds his products generally bringing lower prices. The well-being of the world requires a reasonably stable money, so that upsets may be limited and the disasters that always result from such changes may be avoided."

The stabilization of the purchasing power of money is of vital importance to our State. Iowa is primarily a State of production, and her prosperity depends on a satisfactory level of prices. Many of her citizens are debtors, who suffer with tragic consequences when the price level declines.

The index number heretofore referred to is made up of the weighted average of wholesale prices of 550 of the leading commodities in the United States, and is compiled monthly. There is a distinction between the price level of all these commodities as reflected in the index number and individual prices. The price level is affected by inflation and deflation. To stabilize the purchasing power of money is to stabilize the price level, and to stabilize the price level is to prevent inflation and deflation. Even though the price level is stabilized and the index number remains stationary, or nearly so, individual prices may move up or down according to the law of supply and demand.

This problem of stable money has been tackled during the last year by the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange, the American Federation of Labor, some State bankers' associations, and other organizations, including the Iowa State Bar Association. Committees are at work on the problem, some reports have been submitted, but to date no definite specific program has been recommended.

There are some plans that have received wide discussion. One plan is that we do away with the gold standard altogether and have nothing but credit money. This has the support of John Meynard Keynes, eminent British economist and financier. This plan has not received widespread approval on account of the feeling that we should have a money redeemable in some certain metal or metals.

The late Professor Lehfeldt, of South Africa, proposed a plan that the gold-producing nations buy up the gold mines and operate them in the public interest. His proposal was that when there is too much gold, resulting in rising price level, shut down some of the mines; and when there is too little gold, resulting in falling prices, operate more mines even at a loss. Thus by regulating the world supply of gold the price level would be regulated.

Another plan which has received much discussion is by Frof. Irving Fisher, of Yale. His proposal contemplates a change in the number of grains of gold in the dollar, so as to maintain a stable price level. When gold becomes cheap put more grains of gold in the dollar, so it will buy the same quantity of commodities in general. When gold becomes dear reduce the grains of gold in the dollar, so it will buy the same quantity of commodities in general. Thus he would stabilize the purchasing power of money and maintain the price level.

What we have to find is a method of arranging means of exchange and also means of payment in such a manner as to prevent violent fluctuations in the price level. This is another way of saying that means of payment should be adjusted to the commodity price level. In a period of falling prices it is not so much that commodities have fallen in price as the value of gold has gone up. In other words, the Fisher plan contemplates that the value of gold in the dollar should be determined by the general price level of commodities instead of determining the price level of commodities by the value of gold in the dollar.

Every question that involves the welfare, happiness, and prosperity of the people is of concern to the members of the legal profession. A well-known maxim is, "Equity will not suffer a wrong to be without a remedy." This maxim should be applied to economic wrong. It is the business of every well-wisher of the Republic to find remedy for wrong.

The problems that have confronted our Government and our people in the past have been many, complex, and trying. The problems have been political, social, moral, and economic. Each problem was faced with frankness, courage, intelligence, and toleration, and solution was always found. The problems confronting the country since the late war have been the greatest and most complex since the foundation of our Government. We can depend upon the intelligence and spirit of our people to carry forward and onward in the future as in the past.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY] as he may desire.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, a little while ago the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] commented on a speech that I made over the radio on the 19th of June. In a previous conversation a day or two ago he told me he had listened in on the speech and that he had seen mention of it in a number of papers.

From the comment he made in his speech I am afraid that he did not get the full import of the argument that I tried to present on that occasion. In order that the entire speech may be available I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating that address.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The address is as follows:

ECONOMIC INFLUENCES AS REFLECTED IN BUSINESS CONDITIONS

When this financial and business depression shall have passed and some future essayist discourses on the conditions of the present time, he will probably describe it as having been the most dismal year in the mercantile, investment, and financial history of the United States. He will, no doubt, tell us how trade and industry were prostrated as never before; how business activities in every line steadily dwindled almost to the point of absolute stoppage; how the security markets reached a condition of utter collapse; how the farmer passed through a period of extreme distress because of the shrinkage in the market values of his product; how the largest and wealthiest business institutions in normal times, such as the steel and copper industries, the great railway organizations and carrier systems of the country, reached the point where their very solvency was threatened; how bank failures, large and small, were spread throughout the country—so numerous as to become startling; how every type and character of business was profoundly affected; and how millions of workers sought employment and found no work to do.

A satisfactory explanation of the causes which have brought on this condition is as impossible to detail as it is to point out the atmospheric cross currents and forces that bring changes in the weather. We glide imperceptibly from the day of clear skies and beautiful sunshine into the day of overhanging clouds, high winds, and beating storms.

In the early part of 1929 apparent prosperity was in evidence on every hand. All property was advancing in value; stocks, bonds, and securities were selling at fabulous prices. The sunshine of prosperity was about us. It was the condition of the business mind of the country.

Then came October of 1929 and with it the break. Prices tumbled, business confidence changed to a sense of fear, and we were confronted with a new day. What had been normal production became, overnight, overproduction. Factories closed down or went on part time; unemployment was the result. Purchasing power of the consumer was curtailed or destroyed, thereby causing underconsumption. This in turn increased the apparent overproduction, and the process went on, becoming more oppressing as it grew.

No clear understanding of present conditions can be reached without a general glance at the field of finance and wealth. Wealth is a somewhat varying term. It must be considered in relation to physical properties and the general desire to own and possess them. The peak of wealth in the United States was reached in 1920 when it was placed at $494,000,000,000. By 1929 this had dropped to $373,000,000,000 and to $340,000,000,000 in 1930. Since that time there has been a gradual shrinkage of the national wealth, until now it is probably not more than $325,000,000,000. However, it is fair to say that with the shrinkage of national wealth, as measured in dollars, from $494,000,000,000 to $325,000,000,000, or approximately $170,000,000,000, the purchasing power of the dollar has increased, thereby largely offsetting this shrinkage in national wealth.

Attention should also be given to what is called the national income. The money value of the annual national income in the United States was fixed at $84,000,000,000 in 1929. In 1930 it had dropped to $66,700,000,000, a loss of $17,300,000,000, or 20.4 per cent. This loss was very largely suffered by labor and agriculture. It is the direct fruit of unemployment and reduced commodity prices. This in turn has caused the depression to more seriously affect the masses of the people.

One of the things generally alleged by economists to have played a part in bringing about our financial depression was the excess of production over consumption, both in raw materials and manufactured goods. It is doubtful that if the masses of our people had sufficient sustained purchasing power to provide themselves with the reasonable necessities of life that any overproduction of food supplies or manufactured goods would have ever been apparent.

Another contributing cause has been the artificial maintenance of commodity prices by arrangements which serve for a time, encouraging production out of line with the economic law of supply and demand. When these arrangements failed and commodity prices fell it was with sudden effect rather than in a slow and orderly manner.

Unquestionably, another contributing cause has been the high tariff wall built up by the recent Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, which paralyzed trade and exchange of commodities to an unnecessary degree with other countries.

The funded war debt owed the United States by European countries is more than $12,000,000,000. Other loans made by American bankers and individuals to foreign countries and their nationals have been placed at more than $15,000,000,000. The annual interest on these debts is easily more than a billion dollars, and this interest has usually been met by new borrowings from our country. Before the Hawley-Smoot bill became a law the annual trade balance was over a billion dollars in favor of the United States.

I have called attention to the situation to suggest that the only possible way the foreign countries and their nationals can pay their debts to our Government and its people is through the channels of trade and commerce. If the countries who owe us had all the gold in the world that is outside of the United States Treasury, it would not be more than $6,000,000,000. If they should deliver that gold to us as a payment on their obligations, it would not discharge one-fourth of the amount that are due us.

There is one of two things that must happen. The United States must accept, through the channels of trade, the commodities of foreign countries in discharge of their debts to us, or we will ultimately find it necessary and compulsory to cancel our claims against the foreign debtors. I do not favor that course; I rather prefer a modification of our tariff law so as to make it possible for us to trade with foreign countries as we have formerly done, so that we can sell them our wheat, our cotton, and our other products of which we have a surplus, and take in trade for them commodities they have to offer and for which we have a need. If our country is overloaded with money—and we do have now almost one-half of the world's supply of gold—if the countries that owe us are without money to buy our surplus products, and if by reason of the recent high tariff we will not permit our people to exchange their products for the products of other countries, we not only make it impossible to collect the debts due us but we bring trade and commerce to a standstill and commit them to a condition of stagnation.

There can be but little doubt that our recent tariff act, which is the highest tariff law ever enacted in our country, played a great part in setting in motion the machinery which has resulted in a world-wide depression. From the very beginning of the consideration of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill foreign countries feared its result on the commerce of the world. They have protested against its enactment, and in many instances have enacted retaliatory tariff laws in a spirit of resentment.

Silver is the basis of currency in India, China, and Mexico. These countries contain one-third of the people in the world. Silver has dropped in price until the commodity value of the silver in a dollar is worth only 28 cents. With the shrinkage of the value of silver, the purchasing power of the countries whose currencies are based on silver has likewise shrunk. Since they can not pay for commodities in other countries they have largely ceased to be factors in commerce. Exports to these countries have been reduced and trade has lost as a result. Silver is one of the two monetary metals, and its fall in value has been a contributing cause throughout the world to the depression.

Our situation is not caused by lack of money, or by high interest rates. Of the ten and a quarter billion dollars of gold in the world, our country holds $4,797,000,000, or 46.8 per cent of it. This perhaps is more than we need for any purpose of stabilizing our currency. If all the gold in the world, two-thirds of which is held by France and the United States, was more evenly distributed among the commercial nations, the currency of those nations would be more stabilized. This would increase their purchasing power and would enable them to take a more active part in trade and commerce.

We often hear it said that "The banks now have more money than ever before. What is the matter with business?" The circulating medium of "money" in the United States has not varied greatly during the past few years. It stands at about four and three-quarter billion dollars, or about $38 per capita. What does vary greatly is the bank checks and other methods used in banking to transfer credit from one trader to another. Of the business transacted, not more than 8 per cent is done by cash. Personal checks, bank drafts, and other commercial paper represent the other 92 per cent. This is the "currency" that has greatly diminished during the past year. That is due to the fact that business is retrenching. It does not desire capital or credit. Domestic commerce is more or less at a standstill. The American public is simply not in a mind to buy.

Interest rates on money are the lowest ever known in our country. The Federal Reserve Bank of New York recently fixed the rate 1½ per cent per annum. It is 3 per cent and less at the other Federal reserve banks. Yet business does not seek loans at these prices; it remains inactive and the depression goes on.

We often hear the question, "When will times become normal again?" Of course, no one can answer. But, in a general way, we know that the depression can not clear up until the conditions causing it have been remedied. World trade must be accelerated to something like its former volume. National credits must be revived. Tariff walls must be lowered and the exchange of commodities resumed. The $17,000,000,000 annual deficit in our national income must be restored and the 6,000,000 unemployed workers be given jobs. These adjustments will require time. Such momentous results can not be accomplished in a day. In the meantime it will help if men will deal with the situation as they find it and not continue to look backward on yesterday. We should cut loose from the wreckage of plans and schemes of other days which line the financial shores on every side and cast our eyes before us with new plans for new developments, using the advantages now in hand. As these develop we will take a new interest in things. We will again get on a firm foundation and regain our business confidence. When this is done we will be on a fair road to recovery.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOZIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the President's message and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that all gentlemen who have spoken to-day on the President's message may be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

WAR DEBTS AND REPARATIONS

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request that I made this morning to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing certain tables and other information. This was objected to by the gentleman from Texas, but I understand now that he does not object to its going into the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, the only reason I held the matter up this morning was that the Senate yesterday passed the Johnson resolution, which is to spend $50,000 to accumulate these same facts. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] has a resolution that went in to-day that gives the Ways and Means Committee authority to appoint a committee of the House to investigate these same facts. I think it is worth while, however, for the membership to have this information, and I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, the New York American has published figures indicating the extent to which Americans have invested in securities of foreign countries.

It is evident from these articles that a thorough search was made for facts. The results of the New York American's survey were published in a series of articles.

In view of the widespread interest in this subject, with Congress considering the war debts owed the United States by foreign nations, I believe the articles from the New York American will be of great assistance to Congress and the country.

The articles are as follows:

[No. 1, November 8, 1931]

BILLIONS OF DOLLARS LOSS TO AMERICAN PRIVATE INVESTORS IN FOREIGN SECURITIES IS DISCLOSED IN A SURVEY JUST COMPLETED BY THE NEW YORK AMERICAN

The survey, covering the entire field of the American public's foreign financing since the war, reveals enormous depreciation in at least 90 per cent of the foreign bonds and stocks sold to the American public during the hectic period facetiously characterized as "America's attainment of its financial majority."

What this achievement has cost America's private investors is tragically portrayed in facts and figures which will be presented in a series of articles of which this is the first.

COST ENORMOUS

What the cost of the foreign financing folly has been indirectly can only be approximated. How serious an influence the phenomenal losses in foreign securities have been on the American securities market can only be surmised.

Suffice to accept as probably enormous the pressure which the huge losses have exerted upon banking and private loans secured in large part by the supposedly safe foreign securities. With the rapid shrinkage of their value the effect undoubtedly has been to force heavy dumping of our own American securities with disastrous consequences to the American markets.

The survey includes only those securities actually publicly offered in the United States and, presumably, bought by the public in firm conviction that they were participating in sound investments, as represented by the Nation's leading bankers.

SCOPE LIMITED

No account is taken of the enormous aggregate of short-term credits, central bank credits, etc., running upward of a billion dollars, and advanced in great part out of public funds placed with the Nation's banking community. Nor is Canada's vast borrowings included in the survey.

The story of America's private foreign "investments" is one of simple faith and bitter disillusionment.

It is a tale of violent depreciation, of virtual cancellation of invested funds. It is written across the boundaries of virtually all nations, great and minor, of Europe, and through the whole of South America. Other parts of the world contribute to the tragedy, but these two continents—Europe and South America—absorbed the greatest proportion of America's private foreign lending of the postwar and war periods.

America's private foreign financing is a portrait of a nation following blindly the dictates of a banking community suddenly become international-minded getting into "foreign entanglements" in a financial sense, and running amuck on misguided conception of foreign "investing" or lending, extension of loans with a colossal ignorance of prospects, and with a prodigality unequaled in the economic history of the world.

The American private investor's experience in foreign financing has become a nightmare, and hundreds of thousands of our investors have suffered therefrom.

In all, the world at large during the period of 1914–1930 came to the United States for a total of $15,000,000,000 in loans.

This is wholly exclusive of the billions advanced directly by our Government to Europe's governments as "war loans" and which the debtor countries to-day are seeking to have canceled.

Funds for those loans, too, came from the American investor via the Liberty and Victory loans, but for the purpose of the present survey they are entirely ignored. As a matter of fact, these government loans have at least the United States Government's backing and as such presumably are subject to protection by Uncle Sam.

But what of the private "investor"?

THREE CLASSIFICATIONS

There are three classes of foreign financing:

1. Government loans—by the United States Government to foreign governments (the war loans).

2. Private credits—extended by banks and banking houses out of funds in their control.

3. Public loans—advances by American banks and bankers to foreign governments and corporations and municipalities, the funds being derived from sale to American private investors of the bonds and stocks of the foreign governments or corporations.

It is with the latter class of financing alone that the American's survey is dealing.

From an insignificant annual lending of a comparatively few millions, or better still, from being itself a borrower, the United States following the war became the great supplier of capital for the entire world.

QUESTION OF PRIORITY

Naturally, in view of the difficulties which since have become publicly known, the major question becomes—

Which class of loan shall have priority, government-to-government, private credits, or loans made by private American investors? This is a matter of prime importance to the private investor, especially in view of the violent campaigns now engaging the financial world with respect to priority of loans. For a great many investors the question already has been answered by reason of the virtual wiping out of their investments.

Our annual private lending abroad bounded forward with amazing rapidity, until it finally crossed the billion-dollar mark in 1924. Then followed a remarkable era of billion-dollar years, during which governments, corporations, municipalities, churches, and almost every other conceivable enterprise or element the world over drew upon the seemingly endless American reservoir of capital.

NO DEFINITE POLICY

And borrowing was easy. The American investor was relying upon the bankers. And faith in the banker was virtually the only measuring rod for the investor, for the bankers themselves were subjected to virtually no restriction.

The State Department at Washington, which conceivably is the proper safety valve for such activities has never had a definite policy regarding private loans to foreigners or foreign issues floated in the United States. From Washington comes this explanation of the State Department attitude:

"There is an understanding between financiers and the department by which all such loans are submitted informally to the State Department before any action is taken in order to secure State Department approval.

"This has been the practice for some time now dating back to the Coolidge administration. In general, loans are approved if for constructive purposes rather than for military purposes."

LITTLE RESTRAINT

Actually the State Department control over foreign issues has been perfunctory. Its restrictive powers were exercised, if at all, in exceptionally few instances on record.

No official restraint was practiced anywhere in the United States with respect to foreign loans being sold to American private investors. Not even the blue-sky control which frequently detects and prevents fraudulent or suspicious domestic financing was effective in stemming the tide of foreign loans.

The sellers of these foreign securities enjoyed an absolutely free hand in their foreign-issue offerings in the American market, even securing listing on the New York Stock Exchange and other American exchanges by the mere formality of presenting an innocuous document prepared by the minister of finance or treasurer of the foreign nation, municipality, or enterprise.

No check-up was made by the stock exchange to ascertain the accuracy of the statements therein made, and no recourse is left to the American investor but to sit idly by while his investment suffers untold shrinkage.

NO RECOURSE

For to what source is the American private investor to appeal for aid in proving suspicions of fraud or immorality in the financing? At least the great banks of the country and the banking houses now worried by their "frozen credits" in foreign nations can demand Government support to their attempts to recuperate their losses.

But the individual private investor has nothing but a vicious loss to record his participation in the Nation's rise to "world banking leadership."

How great an outpouring of public offerings of foreign securities was experienced during the last eight years alone is graphically evidenced in the following table:

1923	$497,000,000
1924	1,217,000,000
1925	1,316,000,000
1926	1,288,000,000
1927	1,577,000,000
1928	1,489,000,000
1929	705,000,000
1930	1,087,000,000

What amazing influence had stretched itself over the United States sufficient to induce such prodigal lending? True, the Nation emerged from the war powerful in resources, and its material wealth, aside from loss of man power, was tremendously increased.

But why the staggeringly immense foreign lending?

SECRET GUARDED

Representative MCFADDEN, chairman of the Congressional Banking and Currency Committee, has publicly declared that international bankers reap commissions or profits of 8 to 10 per cent on foreign financing.

The exact figures of commissions or profits are closely guarded secrets. The New York American attempted to ascertain the figures from New York bankers, from Washington, Paris, London, Berlin, and elsewhere, but all to no avail. They may hold the secret for the great banking flotations! There has lately arisen a growing demand for congressional investigation of the whole sordid story of American foreign financing spree.

Representative MCFADDEN'S assertions, if they can be accepted, would place a possible profit to the bankers on their foreign financing operations at from twelve hundred million to fifteen hundred million dollars. At 5 per cent the profits to the security dealers would be $750,000,000.

But whatever the inducement for the great flood of foreign financing the American investor is paying the fiddler.

SOUTH AMERICA HIT

What is the record? Only facts and figures are presented.

In the course of the American's survey a compilation became available from a seemingly unprejudiced source. It is a table presenting details of the United States public's "investing" record in South America. The source is the Latin-American Bondholders' Association (Inc.), an organization formed, incidentally, because of the tragic depreciation in our investments on that continent.

The losses suffered in South American investments are fantastic.

The association's compilation relates that approximately 80 per cent of American investments in that continent had been wiped out by reason of the depreciation in market values of the "dollar loans" sold to the United States public!

Here are the association's figures:

One hundred and twenty-two South American dollar loans have shrunk in value an aggregate of eleven hundred million dollars.

Their aggregate par value is only $1,531,906,000.

WORTH ONLY 10 PER CENT

For some countries the bonds sold to American private investors dropped to an average of less than 10 per cent of their par value. Peru's bonds were selling this year at 6.8 per cent of par!

Nor was this an isolated case.

Bolivia's bonds were quoted at but 7.7 per cent of par.

But why take individual instances for recording? Here is the association's compilation country by country:

	Amounts issued	Approximate principal amounts outstanding	Approximate market value at 1931 low		Contraction in values from par
			Dollars	Per cent of par
Argentina	$420,418,500	$389,414,000	122,035,000	31.4	$267,379,000
Bolivia	68,653,500	59,293,000	4,521,000	7.7	54,772,000

Total	1,531,906,000	1,396,185,000	272,743,000	-------	1,123,442,000

One of the Peruvian National Government issues sold at 5¼. The interest alone called for 6. The bonds were sold at 91½.

The association estimates that 200,000 investors and millions of other people in the United States are directly involved in these loans. The chairman of the association remarks:

"It is too much to hope that all of these issues will ever be paid 100 per cent."

Chile, Bolivia, and Peru already have defaulted on their bonds.

EXACT STATUS VAGUE

Brazil, while not actually in default, has made an arrangement whereby its obligations are paid by coupons of interest-bearing scrip. Considerable mystery still surrounds the actual disposition of the Brazilian debts.

The scrip policy has been officially adopted by the Government of Brazil through an arrangement with creditors, but as yet the Brazilian States and municipalities have not announced their status regarding their securities.

[No. 2, November 9, 1931]

FINANCING COMPLETED MAINLY THROUGH SALE OF "DOLLAR BONDS"

During the period 1914–1930, inclusive, $2,383,000,000 South American government and corporate bonds and stocks were sold to private investors in the United States.

The total borrowings were divided as follows:

Argentina	$924,740,000
Chile	514,652,000
Brazil	448,667,000
Colombia	219,774,000
Peru	103,710,000
Bolivia	72,930,000
Uruguay	53,918,000
Venezuela	42,892,000
Paraguay	2,272,000

The greatest portion of South American financing in this market has been through sale of "dollar bonds" to the American private investor. There are still outstanding, at par value, $1,396,000,000 of such bonds.

VALUE AT LOW PRICES

Their value, however, at the 1931 low prices, approximated $272,000,000, a depreciation of 80 per cent.

The above table of South American "investments" sold to American investors entirely excludes whatever credits have been advanced to South American governments, business enterprises, municipalities, and others, where the funds were not obtained through direct sale of securities to the American public.

It is understood that the aggregate of such credits is enormous. There has also been a huge total of offerings to the American public of securities representing United States or semi-United States companies operating in South America, but which also has been excluded from the present study.

BIG SHRINKAGE

The record of the "dollar loans" of South America bought by American private investors is dramatic evidence of the phenomenal shrinkage in values. The complete record of each "dollar loan," as compiled by the Latin-American Bondholders Association (Inc.), is shown in the following table:

MORE THAN SIX BILLION BORROWED HERE FROM PUBLIC INVESTORS

European governments and semigovernmental agencies, when they sought loans in this country in recent years, found the American investor's pocketbook wide open.

Advised by American bankers that they were making sound and safe investments, American private investors absorbed a staggering amount of European securities.

The price they have paid for their error is colossal.

The New York American's survey discloses a depreciation of almost $800,000,000 has taken place in American private investors' holdings of European government and quasi-government securities.

What the American private investor has lost in European corporate securities (as distinguished from government and government-guaranteed issues) is another story, but equally tragic.

Since 1914 Europe as a whole obtained upwards of sixty-seven hundred million dollars from American private investors in the form of loans or through sale of stocks in this country.

This is 40 per cent of all foreign investments made by American private investors during the period 1914–1930, inclusive. In all, 15 billions of foreign offerings were floated in the American market to private investors.

Emphasis is placed on private investors throughout the present series so that there will be no misconception of the field covered.

This series deals only with foreign bonds and stocks actually sold to the private American investor through public offering by American bankers. It ignores entirely the billions lent directly by the United States Government to Europe's governments as "war loans."

Twenty-six European nations and political subdivisions dipped into the American private investor's funds at some time or other during the last 17 years. And where the government or municipality of a country or region for some reason or other failed to float an American loan, its corporations borrowed in the United States.

Governments, however, accounted for approximately five-sixths of the total borrowings.

The complete record covering the 17-year period 1914–1930 for every European country or division will be found at the right.

Not all of these securities still are outstanding. Some have been retired, and a great number of "refunding" operations have been effected whereby new securities were issued, almost invariably through the American market, to substitute for or retire issues previously outstanding.

There still are outstanding in excess of $2,400,000,000 of such European government and government-guaranteed issues, at par value. This is the total now owned by American investors.

The current market value of these issues is $1,600,000,000.

Their depreciation from par value is $772,000,000.

[No. 4, November 12, 1931]

Here is the fourth article in New York American survey of foreign securities sold to American private investors. Thus far the following facts have been shown:

First. Some fifteen billions of foreign government and foreign corporation securities have been floated in the United States since 1914.

Second. Eleven hundred million dollars' depreciation has taken place from par in American private investor's holdings of South American "dollar bonds."

Third. European government and semigovernment issues of European countries sold to American private investors have shrunk in value almost $800,000,000.

Fourth. The list of American citizens' investments in the government bonds of 16 European countries shows a loss of 43 per cent from par value at a recent figure, which was not the low figure of the European debacle.

Fifth. Banking commissions on the sale of the fifteen billion of foreign securities floated in the United States since 1914 would amount to $750,000,000 if 5 per cent can be accepted as a fair average commission.

These bankers' commissions, however, sometimes greatly exceed 5 per cent, so that an estimate of $1,000,000,000 in commissions would not be excessive.

Sixth. None of the foregoing figures have anything to do with United States Government loans direct to European nations during and immediately following the war.

Securities of 16 European governments and government agencies have shrunk in value more than 43 per cent since they were sold to American private investors.

Total depreciation from par value of these European securities amounts to more than $700,000,000.

And still this enormous loss excludes entirely the vast amount of European corporation securities which also were sold to American investors.

LOSSES TO INVESTORS

For the purpose of ascertaining the status of American private investment in European government and semigovernment enterprises the New York American survey was divided into two parts. The part dealt herewith covers those countries where the decline has been bigger than 10 per cent.

Losses to American investors run into staggering amounts. The $75,000,000 old Russian loans, for example, have been completely wiped out.

Depreciation of 50 per cent or more are frequent.

Accompanying compilation reveals the tragic consequences of America's liberality in lending billions of dollars to Europe, over and above the billions advanced by our Government as war loans.

Every country in Europe availed itself of the American liberality.

Germany was a particular beneficiary. That nation's government and semigovernment units now owe to American private investors over $700,000,000.

CURRENT VALUE

How the market rates this debt is exemplified by the current value of only $277,000,000.

Depreciation in German Government and semigovernment securities alone approximates 57 per cent.

It is a sad commentary on the German lending that some of that nation's outstanding citizens now complain that they were virtually implored by American bankers to accept loans. The proceeds in a great many instances, notwithstanding the supposedly dire needs of the country, were utilized for the construction of bathing facilities, parks, playgrounds, and similar developments.

The bankers' funds for making those loans of course came from the private American investor who bought the German bonds offered by the bankers.

But even this isn't the worst experience for the American investor, forgetting the Russian loan folly.

Bulgarian securities sold to the American private investor have dropped in value 62 per cent.

Hungarian issues have slumped 60 per cent. Yugoslavian securities are available now for 45 per cent of par, a depreciation of 55 per cent. Poland's securities have slumped 43 per cent. And so on down the line for the entire 16 nations of Europe.

Czechoslovakia, Italy, and Norway, along among the 16 countries surveyed to-day, show depreciation of 20 per cent or less. Norway's securities have slumped 10 per cent.

These facts are reflective of aggregate totals for each nation.

Individual issues have slumped as much as 75 per cent.

The table gives in detail the experiences of the average American investor in the 16 countries.

[No. 5, November 14, 1931]

1. Four hundred and fifty million dollars depreciation has taken place in value of German Government and semi-Government securities sold to American private investors.

2. American investment losses in German securities are the largest in any foreign nation.

3. There is outstanding to-day and owed to American investors more than $700,000,000 of German Government and semi-Government loans.

4. Germany has been the most prodigious European postwar borrower from the United States. Her aggregate borrowings from private investors in this country have exceeded thirteen hundred millions, almost all advanced during the period 1924–1930, inclusive. Our international bankers sold these securities to American investors, thereby earning large commissions.

5. Germany for years used her American borrowings to meet her reparations debts.

6. The ogre of a possible moratorium for Germany hangs over all her obligations.

For seven years, 1924–1930, inclusive, Germany indulged in the greatest borrowing spree the world has ever witnessed.

In that period the Reich and its political divisions and German corporations marketed in the United States more than thirteen hundred million dollars of their securities.

Liberality with which American investors' funds were advanced to Germany embodied all of the ignorance and amazing lack of foresight which characterized the whole postwar foreign financing era in the United States.

As a result American investment losses in German securities are the largest in any foreign land.

57 PER CENT DEPRECIATION

Of the thirteen hundred and seventy-two million dollars total German financing in the United States, there still is outstanding $780,000,000 of Government and semi-Government issues at par value.

Market value of these securities to-day is $329,000,000.

Depreciation totals $450,000,000, or 57 per cent.

And even this enormous shrinkage is totally exclusive of losses suffered in German corporate securities floated to an aggregate above $400,000,000.

Successful flotation of the Dawes plan loan in the international capital markets opened the eyes of Germany to the vast possibilities for enticing foreign capital into that country. There followed then a period of foreign financing for Germany which has no duplicate in world history.

From years of absolutely no German financing in the American market there developed an amazing growth of German security sales here. The United States, then in the supposedly endless era of prosperity at home, absorbed hundreds of millions in German securities.

Germany, to her amazement, found the American money markets actually eager to secure her bonds and stocks. And Germany finally discovered some embarrassment in using these foreign funds.

For several years during the fantastic era Germany utilized the proceeds of her foreign financing, chiefly from American investors, to meet her reparations requirements.

USE OF LOANS

Furthermore, German recipients of American investors' liberality deemed it advisable to build up their industrial machinery to compete once again in the world's markets. Proceeds of loans were also used in the construction of public conveniences above and beyond necessities. Playgrounds, home developments, public parks, and similar undertakings were all financed with the inflowing foreign capital.

How freely the American market absorbed German securities is evidenced in the following table. It presents yearly totals of German Government and semi-Government securities publicly sold to American private investors:

[Thousands omitted]

Year	Government	Corporate	Total
1924	$110,000	$8,000	$118,000
1925	158,750	59,500	218,250
1926	151,138	143,108	294,245
1927	150,405	80,120	230,525
1928	186,370	106,106	292,476
1929	21,476	10,149	31,625
1930	143,308	23,510	166,818
Total	941,846	430,793	1,372,639

The aftermath of this fantastic era of foreign lending by the American investor is chilling. To-day the world is rife with ugly rumors concerning Germany's capacity to pay, her inclination to meet her obligations, and similar doubts questioning the safety of all foreign investments in Germany. And the United States investor has the biggest stake of any nation's private investors. This, of course, excludes the political and intergovernmental debts.

The dollar-and-cents story of American loans to German Government and semi-Government bodies is graphically told in the accompanying table.

NOTE.—Current quotations of above table represent either last sale, last bid, or nominal price.

[No. 6, November 15, 1931]

1. Thirteen hundred million dollars have been raised by European corporations through sale of their securities to American private investors since 1914.

2. Eight hundred millions of such securities still are outstanding and held by American investors.

3. Four hundred and sixty million dollars depreciation has taken place in these securities. This represents 56 per cent loss from par value. By countries, the depreciation runs as high as 83 per cent.

4. Much of this money raised in America has been used in improving and strengthening the competitive position of foreign industries.

5. Value of many foreign corporate securities can not be ascertained because of absence of quotations.

6. German corporation securities represent almost half all American holdings of European securities. Loss in German corporate issues alone totals $210,000,000.

7. Bankers' commissions on European corporate securities ranged from 5 per cent up to several times this rate.

Through sale of their securities to American private investors Europe's corporations raised an aggregate of $1,134,000,000 new capital during the period 1914–1930, inclusive.

The American investor, through American bankers who sold them these securities, have become (a) creditor of European corporations through purchase of their bonds and notes, or (b) partner by buying their stocks.

Either "investment" has proved extremely expensive.

The American private investor still holds $826,956,000 of European corporate securities. This is entirely distinct from European government and semigovernment issues publicly floated in the United States during the same period. These latter, as disclosed in previous articles in the New York American survey, represent an aggregate loss of about $800,000,000 to the American investor.

Those American investors who bought European corporate securities have been equally unfortunate.

Depreciation of $464,398,000 has taken place in these corporate issues.

The shrinkage represents 56 per cent of their par value.

And still this stupendous loss excludes millions more lost in securities for which no present value can be established, or which represent enterprises which have virtually disappeared in recent years.

Corporations of all Europe dipped into the American investment funds for new capital, but German corporations obtained almost half the total for the entire continent.

In these German corporate issues American investors now suffer a depreciation of $210,000,000, equal to 60 per cent.

Accompanying table discloses the experiences of the American investor in Europe's corporation issues sold in this country.

The shrinkage, by countries, runs from 9 per cent for Denmark all the way up to 83 per cent for British corporate flotations in the United States.

Besides Britain and Germany, decline of 60 per cent or more is shown in corporate securities of the following countries: Belgium, 62 per cent; Luxemburg, 63 per cent; Poland, 63 per cent; Netherlands, 70 per cent.

Almost invariably the American investor's money placed in European corporate issues was used to modernize, strengthen, or otherwise improve the competitive position of the corporation. In some instances the American capital provided the wherewithal to build new plants in foreign lands. It would not be a far exaggeration to say that American private investors capitalized the postwar industrial revival of Europe.

VALUE OF UNITED STATES INVESTORS' HOLDINGS OF FOREIGN STATE ISSUES DOWN $2,000,000,000

Two billion dollars loss to American private investors who bought European and South American Government securities sold in the United States since 1914 has been disclosed to date by the New York American. These losses, covering only government and semigovernment securities, are divided as follows:

(a) Eleven hundred millions depreciation in South American "dollar bonds," which have dropped 80 per cent in value; and

(b) Eight hundred millions decline, from par, in European government and semigovernment issues sold to private American investors.

Europe and South America combined have taken the bulk of the $15,000,000,000 raised from the American private investor through sale in the United States of foreign securities during the last 17 years.

To-day's article, sixth in the series, is devoted to another phase of the foreign financing era: Sales of European corporation securities to the American public by American bankers, who, it is estimated, profited $1,000,000,000 through selling foreign government and corporation securities in the United States during the period covered by this survey, 1914–1930, inclusive.

[No. 7, November 19, 1931]

Following is seventh article in the New York American survey of foreign securities sold to American private investors since 1914. The survey has disclosed to date:

1. Approximately $15,000,000,000 of such securities have been sold to the American private investors.

2. Losses on such purchases run into billions of dollars. Nearly two and one-half billion depreciation has already been proven in three classes of foreign issues held by American investors:

(a) Eleven hundred million in South American "dollar bonds."

(b) Eight hundred million in European government issues.

(c) Four hundred and sixty-four million in European corporation issues.

3. Probably a billion dollars in commissions were made by America's international bankers in selling these foreign securities to the United States investor.

4. Depreciation of some issues run above 90 per cent; not a few issues have been entirely wiped out.

5. Above figures have nothing whatever to do with United States Government loans direct to European nations during and immediately following the war.

Relatively few countries in the world passed up the opportunity to take advantage of American liberality with respect to purchases of foreign securities publicly offered in the United States during the last 17 years.

Nearly $15,000,000,000 of such securities were sold to American private investors in this period.

Of this aggregate, foreign governments received more than ten billion, or two-thirds.

Foreign corporations raised $3,665,000,000 through sale of their securities to American private investors.

The $15,000,000,000 total referred to is exclusively proceeds of the sale of foreign securities direct to American private investors.

It does not include the billions of dollars advanced by our Government to European governments as "war loans." Neither does it include the billions which have been invested abroad by American corporations.

The New York American survey is concerned only with foreign securities sold to the American private investor.

European governments and other political divisions and corporations have taken upwards of 40 per cent of the total American "investments" in all foreign securities. Three of her nations, England, France, and Germany, have taken upward of a billion dollars each.

Largest of all countries' security sales to Americans, however, is the Canadian total, $3,592,727,000. Argentina's total comes close to a billion. Other large foreign totals are Italy, with $617,000,000, Chile with a half billion, and Cuba, $609,000,000. By continents, the totals are:

EXECUTIVE POWER TO MEET A NATIONAL EMERGENCY

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] may be allowed to extend his remarks on H. J. Res. 67.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, we often hear the remark that legislation of a particular kind is needed and should "have teeth in it." We are face to face with a grave situation in this Nation, and if the weather during the winter is very severe and prolonged and if there is no improvement in employment, there may be a serious crisis, and in order to meet this crisis unusual and extraordinary powers should be vested in the President. If there should be distress and serious danger of great suffering for lack of food or lack of coal or lack of any other necessity of life, the President should not be left to dicker with the owner of coal and the owner of meat and meal and flour and the owner of clothing and cloth and the owner of railroads and other means of transportation. The President should have the power to give instant orders for special trains to carry either food or fuel or people from one part of the country to the other.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we hope it will not be necessary to exercise this power; we hope that the winter will be mild and that unemployment conditions will improve. But if we stumble along motivated merely by hope and do not make provisions in advance for a real emergency, then we have not done our whole duty. It will be too late to pass such legislation after the emergency arises. We should foresee the possibility of such a situation and give the President the power to do whatever may be necessary to be done to give instant relief, and thus prevent what might prove a national disaster, and, therefore, a national disgrace.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have hastily arranged and tried to express in legislative form my thoughts upon this subject, and I have included them in House Joint Resolution 67, which is herewith printed for the information of the Congress and the country. This national emergency board contemplated by my resolution is modeled somewhat after the general powers exercised by the War Industries Board, headed by the Hon. Bernard M. Baruch, during the World War. It is admitted on all hands that the work of said War Industries Board was a most powerful factor in mobilizing the material resources of the Nation for carrying on the war so successfully. While the powers exercised by the said War Industries Board were practically independent of legislative enactment, they were predicated upon the executive power functioning in time of war. The exercise of war power is a very different thing from the exercise of executive power in time of peace. But the Congress has the power to declare the existence of a national emergency even in time of peace, and to apply unusual and extraordinary remedies for its relief. My proposal is to give the President the power to declare the existence of an emergency, and then to give him the power to appoint a board which shall meet the emergency by exercising the powers conferred by the resolution.

It will be noticed that the members of the board are appointed by the President and do not have to be confirmed by the Senate and that all the powers of the board may be exercised by the chairman alone. Hence there will be no excuse to let people suffer or die or freeze in one part of the country when there is an abundance of cheap food and cheap coal in another part of the country, with plenty of idle railroads and trains to carry cheap food and cheap fuel from where it is abundant to the place where it is needed to save life or to prevent suffering. The powers of the States are inadequate in these respects because of the limits of State lines. In most cases the grain and the meat and the coal and the oil necessary to supply the needs of the people in some great congested area will have to pass over the territory of one, two, three, or more States. Furthermore, the President is given the power to commandeer and to take at the prevailing market prices or to compel the use of transportation facilities at a reasonable price, whatever is needed to meet the emergency.

Thus, if there should be a great fire in Chicago, or an earthquake in San Francisco, or hunger riots in New York, or a strike either in the coal mines or on the railroads, the President is not left powerless as he is now and compelled to beg and plead with the public to render voluntary relief. The resources of private charity are being terribly taxed. Probably the reserves of the National Red Cross Society are partly, if not largely, exhaused. When the emergency arises it will be too late to appeal to the people to raise the money to relieve distress. The power should be in the President to start the wheels moving within two or three hours after he receives information of an emergency situation. In the first hour he could appoint the board, if not already appointed, and order the chairman to act by commandeering trains, commandeering carloads of medicines, of flour, meat, coal, oil, cloth, and everything necessary to prevent the loss of human life and to prevent human suffering.

Furthermore, the President can order the Secretary of War to send out tentage, cots, blankets, medical officers, nurses, and trained personnel, and also to furnish from the Army stores food and fuel and medicine to prevent suffering and to save life. Within the next hour, under the direction of the chairman of the National Emergency Board and in cooperation with the Secretary of War, the necessary food, fuel, clothing and medicine and doctors will be on their way, going as fast as airplanes, trains, and motor trucks can carry them for the relief of the people.

This should be permanent legislation. True, it is suggested by the present possibility of an acute emergency, but the powers here proposed to be conferred should reside in the President at all times, because we can never tell when some great disaster shall overtake a section or city of our country. Due to the limitations of our Federal Constitution, there is no police power in the Federal Government, and in time of peace the authority of the President to act for the relief of the people is very different from the authority of the governors of the respective States. But under our economic structure the governors are helpless unless the things necessary to help the people exist within the State. In my own State there is no coal mine and no oil well and very little wheat grown. If our State were endangered by long seasons of terrible cold, our governor would be powerless to furnish fuel to keep our people from freezing.

Fortunately, we have an equitable climate, never severely cold in winter, nor severely hot in summer. True, our industries are dependent upon the interstate commerce for coal and oil, but we have an abundant supply of hydroelectric power, and when coupled up with the South Atlantic superpower system, we are practically independent of a foreign coal supply, except for domestic use and for use in schools, churches, hotels, and other public buildings. But I can conceive of States where the people are dependent for their coal and oil on sources hundreds of miles beyond the limits of the State and are likewise largely dependent for supplies of meat and bread from beyond the State bounds.

Therefore, the President of the whole country should have the continuous power to command every resource of the Nation in any way, at any time, to prevent suffering and loss of life on account of lack of food and fuel and on account of existing intervening State lines. For these reasons, I am urging this resolution, not only as a part of a program for economy, but as a part of the permanent powers of the President.

Joint Resolution 67, to promote the general welfare, to regulate commerce among the several States, and to create fiscal agencies for the Federal Government by authorizing a national emergency board and by defining its powers

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to create a body, politic and corporate, by the name and title of the national emergency board, which shall consist of three persons appointed by the President, who shall designate one of the three persons to be and to exercise the powers of chairman of the board, and all the powers hereinafter conferred shall be exercised by and in the name of the chairman of said board, after consultation with the other members thereof.

SEC. 2. Said board shall have power to pledge the credit of the United States for the purpose of raising money, and shall have power to issue bills and notes in the form of public bonds not exceeding $2,000,000,000, payable in not less than 5 years nor more than 20 years at a rate of interest not exceeding 4 per cent per annum, and to use and expend said money for the purpose of relieving the state of unemployment now existing in the United States, and of thus promoting and stabilizing interstate commerce, and to that end the said national emergency board shall be and constitute a fiscal agency of the United States.

SEC. 3. Said board shall have power to commandeer for its temporary use the use of any property of any person, firm, or corporation, including any or all railroads and any special trains or services of such railroads. Furthermore, said board shall have the right to establish and fix by special order the priority in which shipments may be made, and all such orders shall be respected and obeyed, subject to the claims and penalties hereinafter described.

SEC. 4. Said national emergency board shall have power to appoint State and local committees as its agents and representatives in carrying out its powers, and name also organizations of State, county, town, and municipality, where the same may be desirable for efficiency, speed, and economy.

SEC. 5. Said national emergency board shall have power to lend money to States or to political subdivisions at a rate of interest not exceeding 2 per cent per annum, to be repaid in not exceeding 10 years, said money to be used under the general direction and guidance of said national emergency board for the building of roads, schoolhouses, educational and other public buildings, and other necessary and proper public works of such States and political subdivisions thereof.

SEC. 6. The said national emergency board is hereby authorized and empowered to cooperate with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States in carrying out the existing public-buildings program, and such amendments or additions thereto as shall be made by Congress so as to give employment at the earliest possible moment to the largest possible number of persons, and so as to result in the shipment of large quantities of building materials, and thus to create a demand for labor from the mine, the field, the forest, and other original sources of material.

SEC. 7. This legislation is enacted in view of the national emergency connected with the unemployment of four or five millions of persons in this Nation, thus directly affecting the means of subsistence of their dependents to the extent of twenty or twenty-five million persons, and indirectly affecting the entire population of the United States. It shall be the duty of said national emergency board to use the powers hereby conferred to the fullest extent to assist industry, commerce, and agriculture to resume full activity, and thus to minimize the sufferings incident to said emergency, and to see that no residents of the United States die from hunger or cold. The said national emergency board shall exercise its power to transport grain, fruits, vegetables, meats, and their food products, cotton and wool and their clothing products, lumber and other building materials from where they are abundant and cheap to where they are needed, and to assist and encourage their use and consumption. For such property as the said board may take and consume it shall pay the reasonable market value thereof to the owner at the place and time of taking, and for such property as the board may use, but return to the owner thereafter, it shall pay the reasonable value of such use, including the actual damages, but not including any consequential or speculative damages. In order to prevent profiteering in food, fuel, and clothing, the board shall have the power to control priority of shipments over all interstate carriers, to give preference to shipments of those persons, firms, and corporations selling or offering to sell food, fuel, or clothing at a fair and reasonable price, and to give the consuming public in congested centers of population the advantage of low prices prevailing in the agricultural and fuel-producing areas. If necessary, the said board shall commandeer for temporary use for said purpose trains and train crews, coal mines and oil wells, pipe lines and all necessary facilities and accessories. If deemed wise and expedient the said board may use railroad trains and crews to transport persons from sections of the country wherein cold prevails to the warm southern climates and to return such persons at the end of the cold season. The said board shall have power to construct temporary quarters, and the War Department shall supply such tents, cots, and blankets as the board may require, all of which shall be returned at the end of the emergency.

SEC. 8. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States merely to cooperate with States and municipal authorities in the administration of relief, and the primary duty of the police power of the States rests with the States and the municipalities, and the said board shall respect at all times the local authorities, and shall take initiative only when the limits of the States render State power inadequate to the situation. In lending money to the States and municipalities, the obligations of the governor and State treasurer and mayor and city treasurer, respectively, shall constitute sufficient evidence of indebtedness, leaving it to the public honor of such States and municipalities to supply later any legal deficiency and to return said money as herein contemplated.

SEC. 9. It shall be the duty of all executive heads of departments and the heads of all independent offices to cooperate with all requests of the said board, and the President is hereby empowered and directed during the period of such administration to transfer any duty or function from one department to another department, or to said board, if it may, in his judgment, expedite and facilitate the administration of relief. The Interstate Commerce Commission shall see that all orders of the board as to priority or preference in shipment be respected by the carriers engaged in interstate commerce and that the use of all trains and train crews demanded by the board be furnished by such carriers.

SEC. 10. All funds of the said board from any source shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, and paid out only upon the warrant of the chairman of the said board, countersigned by the secretary thereof, and such warrant shall not be questioned by any person or officer whomsoever, but shall be final and conclusive and beyond question, and promptly paid. The said chairman of the said board and the secretary thereof shall each give bond to the United States in the sum of $1,000,000 to secure and to guarantee the United States against loss and damage by reason of any malfeasance or misfeasance in office, and if they, or either of them, or any other member of said board, or employee, or agent thereof, shall knowingly and willfully draw any warrant for money not legally and honestly due by the said board, or in excess of the amount legally and honestly due, they shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $100,000 and to imprisonment not to exceed 20 years.

SEC. 11. Said board shall make monthly reports in writing to the President of the United States, and shall report oftener if the President shall demand, and shall include in such report a statement of all funds paid out and for what purpose paid, and shall make a final accounting and report of all moneys received and paid out after the President shall declare by public proclamation the emergency is ended and that the services of said board are no longer needed.

SEC. 12. Said board shall have power to employ necessary clerical help and executive assistants and to rent quarters if the same be not available in the Government buildings, and the War Department, Navy Department, and Department of Commerce shall furnish such personnel and material to assist in carrying out the plans of the board as the President may direct. No compensation shall be paid to any person drawing a salary from any State or municipal government for any extra services that may be performed by any such person in cooperation with the board in its efforts to assist the people of such State.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me to ask the gentleman from New York a question?

Mr. SNELL. I think from requests made that we will have probably about an hour or an hour and a half.

Mr. RAINEY. That will be satisfactory.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a very appreciative editorial upon the late Nicholas Longworth, written by a very close newspaper friend of his.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial upon the late Nicholas Longworth, written by a very close newspaper friend of his, Frank R. Kent:

"NICK"

WASHINGTON, April 9.—It is literally true that the death of NICHOLAS LONGWORTH will cause more sincere grief among more people than that of any other man now in public life. He had more real personal friends than any other, and he will be missed in more ways, by more different groups, and for a longer time. In this respect there is no other in House or Senate to compare with him.

Distinguished as was his political position and marked as were his political gifts, it was his personality that counted. He was no back-slapping Pollyannaish politician, who liked everybody indiscriminately and spread his friendship thinly over the wide circle of his acquaintanceship. He was a man of taste and breeding, and there were plenty of people he disliked with extreme cordiality and earnestness. But he was by nature a friendly fellow, extraordinarily engaging, and of an amazing personal attraction. It was very easy to conceive an affection for Nick, and a great many people, in and out of politics, did.

People liked to be with him, not because he was Speaker of the House and a power in his party but because he was Nick. There probably has never been a man in Washington more in demand socially than he, none who mingled with and was at home in as many different classes, more welcome in all. No matter what the group he entered, he added something to it—a sparkle, a charm, a touch of gayety, a vibrant and gallant spirit, against which stilted phrases and cold formality melted like frost in the sun. It was not that Nick did not have a deeply serious side and plenty of dignity when dignity was demanded. In party conferences his clear-headed judgment, his fine sense of proportion, and his instinctive feeling for the fitness of things made him an important and often a controlling factor.

His share in the shaping of legislation and in the molding of party policies is a greater one than showed on the surface, because a large part of his achievements in these directions was through his powers of persuasion and personal influence exerted behind closed doors among a few leaders, with whom his talents as compromiser and conciliator were most effective. The things which Mr. LONGWORTH did in politics, important as some of them were, will not, however, linger as long in the memory as the charm about him personally.

He made the world a gayer place by being in it, life a pleasanter experience for his friends because he was here. It was not possible to be dull long around him. Without being shallow or trivial, he loved to laugh. It wasn't only a sense of the ridiculous he had—it was a gorgeous, God-given sense of humor that made it easy for him to see, grasp, and appreciate those subtle shades in situations and happenings which wholly escape the ordinary man. And to this gift he added the complementary one of imparting this appreciation to others. Good stories gravitated to him naturally from all parts of the country. Men liked to tell them to Nick because of the sureness and quickness of his perception, and they liked to hear him tell them because his personality gave them a rich relish and flavor few others could. He was one of those rare men whose stories could be listened to more than once with undiminished enjoyment.

As Speaker, Mr. LONGWORTH was an extraordinary success. Nearly 20 years ago the House revolted against dictatorship, radically altered its rules so as to strip the Speaker of power, limited him to being the presiding officer of the body, not its boss. The days of Cannonism were definitely over. There were to be no more czars in the Speaker's chair. Nor were there for a good many years. Speaker after Speaker came and went without being much more than a figurehead—until Nick mounted the throne six years ago. Without any revision of the rules, he completely recovered the power of the speakership and was the undisputed leader of the House, with as autocratic control as either Reed or Cannon. It is true he exercised this power with infinitely more tact and grace and gumption and without that touch of offensive arrogance that characterized former House czars. But he was just as much of a czar. What Mr. LONGWORTH clearly proved was that this matter of leadership depends not on the rules but on the man.

The authority he acquired was a real tribute to his shrewdness as a politician, his competency as a presiding officer, and the agreeableness of his personality. It also meant that beneath his uniform amiability and an unusually calm temperament there was a strong streak of real ability and genuine force. Unless there had been, he could not have gained nor held his power in the House. A fine evidence of the quality of the man was the unusual relationship between him and JOHN N. GARNER, Democratic House leader and that party's choice for Speaker in the next Congress. Politically as wide apart as the poles, each eager at all times to take every party advantage of the other, fighting almost daily in the House to the limit of their ability, personally there were never two men more devoted. Each was the other's "best friend" and had been for many years. The passing of Nick is a loss to his party, to Congress, to the country, to his many friends—but no man will miss him more keenly than JACK GARNER, his chief political rival and antagonist.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until Monday, December 14, 1931, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

MONDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1931

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, who art our refuge and strength, a very present help in time of trouble, without whom life is naught, help us this day to a more intimate knowledge of our better self, a swifter recognition of all that is best in our human heritage, that encompassed by Thy love and illuminated by Thy light we may rise above life's mediocre levels to those heights where intuition, transfigured by the dawning of Thy purpose, yields her magic bloom.

By the divine alchemy of Thy grace, purify our hearts, sanctify our reason, unify our aims, clothe us with humility, remove all mordant strife, and help us to love as brethren dedicated to the Nation's weal, that in this day of the world's great need we may further the coming of Thy kingdom in the hearts of men and peace and prosperity among the nations of the world. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

COURTS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith two related bills enacted by the Eighth Philippine Legislature during its second session and approved by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands. They are:

S. No. 261. "An act defining the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands, creating a court of appeals and defining its jurisdiction, and providing for other purposes"; and

S. No. 155. "An act concerning the judiciary; making provision regarding the court of appeals created by act entitled 'An act defining the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands, creating a court of appeals and defining its jurisdiction, and for other purposes'; providing appropriation for said court of appeals; applying the provisions of certain sections of the Revised Administrative Code to said court of appeals, and for other purposes."

Briefly, the purpose of the two acts was to relieve congestion in the work of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands by the creation of an intermediate court of appeals between the courts of first instance and the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands.

Act S. No. 261 purports to diminish the present jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands through transfer of certain of that jurisdiction to the proposed court of appeals. Under section 26 of the organic act of the Philippine Islands the act can not take effect without the prior approval of Congress.

The related act, S. No. 155, provides for the organization of the proposed court of appeals if, and when, authorized by Congress. It contemplated no express approval by Congress of its provisions.

The acts in question are transmitted as indicative of the form and substance of legislation which, at the time of the passage of the acts by the Philippine Legislature, was deemed advisable by that body. Subsequent, however, to the passage of these acts the Philippine Legislature passed legislation relative to the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands which received the approval of the Governor General, and which does not require action by the Congress. That legislation (Act No. 3816, December 8, 1930) authorized an increase in the personnel of the supreme court, the jurisdiction of the court remaining unchanged.

It is believed that existing legislation affords adequate provision for meeting present needs. It is accordingly recommended that neither Act S. No. 261 nor Act S. No. 155 receive the approval of Congress.

HERBERT HOOVER.

Gavryl and others (for the committee), representing 12 societies and over 2,000 cities, assembled in mass meeting at Bristol, Conn., on November 15, 1931, protesting against the deprivation to Poland of her only outlet to the sea (the Polish Corridor), and of her coal and iron mines, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions of the committee on Cuban-American reciprocity, Cuban Chamber of Commerce in the United States (Inc.), favoring the immediate modification of the existing treaty of commercial reciprocity between Cuba and the United States so that prompt mutual aid may be extended to agriculture and industry "in this, the greatest crisis in the history of Cuban-American trade," which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from Walter L. Mitchell, of Haines, Alaska, submitting a proposal for the purchase or lease of the Alaska Railroad, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate copy of a letter from G. W. Hurley, Esq., of Bakersfield, Calif., relative to the case of the El Tejon Indian chief, Juan R. Lazada, in regard to land allotments, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from Walter von Brock, of the Pennsylvania State Hotel Association, of Stroudsburg, Pa., transmitting matter relative to a referendum vote of the Pennsylvania State Hotel Men's Association on the subject of repeal or modification of the prohibition law, showing "out of 520 votes polled in the association all but 18 favored repeal or modification," and favoring the sale of light wines and beer, etc., which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLAINE presented the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

A resolution memorializing Congress to float a $5,000,000,000 bond issue in aid of the unemployed

Whereas it has been suggested that if Congress were to float a $5,000,000,000 bond issue for the purpose of speeding up public works, there would be an early improvement in the present unsatisfactory economic conditions of thousands of the citizens of this country; and

Whereas any plan or suggestion that seeks to solve the problem of unemployment and thus bring about the return of prosperity in all lines of industrial activity and improvement in agricultural conditions is worthy of consideration: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly, That this house hereby respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact the necessary legislation which will provide for the floating of a $5,000,000,000 prosperity loan and the inauguration of a nation-wide building program of public works and internal improvements; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

CHAS. B. PERRY,
Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. BLAINE also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact legislation for unemployment reserves and compensation on a nation-wide basis

Whereas there is general agreement that the employees in industrial establishments should be protected by unemployment reserves in a manner similar to the reserves which industries generally set up to stabilize the dividend payments to stockholders; and

Whereas legislation to this effect ought to be national, inasmuch as the competitive situation makes it difficult for any one State to act alone in this matter: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin hereby respectfully memorializies the Congress of the United States to enact national legislation requiring industries generally to establish unemployment reserves from which discharged workmen are to be compensated when unable to find other employment; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to the presiding officers of both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

HENRY A. HUBER,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
CHAS. B. PERRY,
Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. JONES presented a resolution adopted by the Skagit County (Wash.) Dairymen's Association, commending the Federal Farm Board for its assistance to the farmer, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. KEYES presented a petition numerously signed by sundry citizens of the State of New Hampshire, praying for the prompt ratification of the World Court protocols, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TYDINGS presented petitions numerously signed by citizens of the State of Maryland, praying for the immediate cash payment in full of adjusted-service certificates (bonus), which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial numerously signed by sundry citizens of the States of Maryland and Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the proposed reduction of salaries of Government employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

Mr. CAPPER presented resolutions adopted by Harry Easter Camp, No. 16, United Spanish War Veterans, Emporia, Kans., favoring the imposition of a tariff on crude petroleum, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

THE WORLD COURT

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I send to the desk a copy of the resolution adopted by the State convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Kansas, held at Manhattan, Kans., October 6 to 9, 1931, urging the Senate to take early action on the so-called World Court protocols, and ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the World Court is the outstanding agency for settling international disputes by the application of the principles of international law; and

Whereas its usefulness has been proved by the acceptance of every one of the 35 decisions it has given during the nine years of its existence by the nations involved; and

Whereas the Senate in January, 1926, by a vote of 76 to 17, passed a resolution definitely providing for the entrance of this country into the World Court under five conditions; and

Whereas Secretary Stimson has officially declared that these conditions are entirely met by the three protocols, or treaties, which have for this reason been signed by the United States, by the authority of President Hoover, and now await the Senate's consent to ratification; and

Whereas the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union has for years declared its belief in the need of American participation in the World Court: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Kansas Woman's Christian Temperance Union meeting on October 6 to 9, 1931, heartily indorses early ratification of the three World Court protocols and earnestly requests the United States Senate to take favorable action upon them at the earliest practicable time; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of this meeting be instructed to send copies of this resolution early in the opening of the next session of the Senate to—

(1) Every member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

(2) Senator CAPPER, with a request that he have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

(3) Senator MCGILL.

Mr. AUSTIN presented a resolution unanimously adopted by the Vermont Bar Association, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The following resolution was unanimously adopted by the Vermont Bar Association at its annual meeting held in Montpelier, Vt., October 6, 1931:

"Whereas at a meeting of this association held on the 3d day of January, 1924, the association adopted the following resolution:

"'Resolved, That the Bar Association of the State of Vermont join in what it believes to be the wise judgment of the American people that the United States ought to become one of the supporters of the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague and that our Government, therefore, should adhere to the protocol establishing the court in the manner set forth by President Harding in his message to the Senate on February 24, 1923, which recommendation was recently approved and renewed by President Coolidge in his message to Congress.'

"And thereafter on January 27, 1926, the United States Senate by resolutions duly adopted did advise and consent to the adherence on the part of the United States to the said protocol and the adjoined statute for the Permanent Court of International Justice (without accepting or agreeing to the optional clauses for compulsory jurisdiction), subject to certain reservations and understandings which thereby were made a part and condition of said resolutions.

"And on March 18, 1929, a protocol for the adherence of the United States to the said Permanent Court was recommended by a committee of jurists, one of whom was the Hon. Elihu Root, providing a means for the carrying out of the reservations and understandings set forth in the Senate resolution of January 27, 1926, and this protocol was opened for signature on September 14, 1929; and

"Whereas the President has now asked the consent of the Senate to the ratification of these World Court treaties or protocols:

"'1. The protocol of signature of the statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice;

"'2. The protocol of accession of the United States of America to the protocol of signature of the statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice; and

"'3. The protocol of revision of the statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice,' which were signed by the United States on December 9, 1929;

"And since the Department of State has officially declared that by these protocols the difficulties which caused the Senate's reservations of 1926 concerning advisory opinions have been fully met;

"And since the completion of the step which the United States Senate, by its resolution of 1926, took to secure the adherence of the United States to the court is in direct line with the traditional American policy favoring the judicial settlement of certain classes of international disputes; and

"Whereas this association desires to reaffirm its position taken in 1924 relative to the United States adhering to this court and believing that the ratification by the United States of America of these protocols of the Permanent Court of International Justice is required both by the self-interest of the United States and by its natural obligation as a member of the community of nations, and that such ratification is a movement for world peace: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Vermont Bar Association in meeting assembled in Montpelier, Vt., on the 6th day of October, 1931,

"1. That the adherence of the United States of America to the Permanent Court of International Justice is an essential step to the maintenance of world peace, the promotion of good feeling and fellowship among the community of nations, and a step desirable in itself;

"2. That the protocols protect in all respects the interests of the United States;

"3. That therefore the three protocols should be promptly ratified by the United States of America without further amendment; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of this association be instructed to send a copy of this resolution—

"1. To Senator DALE and Senator AUSTIN, with the respectful request to the latter that it shall be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD;

"2. To every member of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, whenever that committee begins the discussion of the World Court protocols, with the respectful request that they lend their influence to an early and favorable report on the protocols so the Senate may be able to vote upon them without further delay;

"3. To the outstanding papers in Vermont;

"4. To President Hoover and Mr. Stimson, Secretary of State."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations resolutions adopted by the Arkansas Bar Association in 1930 and 1931, by the Arkansas Department of the American Legion, by the Arkansas Baptist Convention, by the Arkansas Federation of Women's Clubs, by the Woman's City Club of Little Rock, by the Cooperative Club of Little Rock, by the Pope County Bar Association, and sundry other organizations, all in the State of Arkansas, relating to the ratification of the protocols pertaining to the World Court.

There being no objection, the resolutions, with related matter, were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INDORSEMENT OF RATIFICATION OF WORLD COURT PROTOCOLS BY ARKANSAS ORGANIZATIONS

ARKANSAS BAR ASSOCIATION

1930

Resolved, That the Arkansas Bar Association heartily approves the treaty providing that this country shall give its adhesion to the World Court; a measure which will be of incalculable value in preserving peace between the nations and spreading a spirit of good will among mankind. We therefore respectfully petition the President to transmit the treaty to the Senate at the first favorable opportunity, and we respectfully urge its ratification upon the Senate.

1931

Whereas the President has now transmitted to the Senate, and asked its consent to their ratification, three World Court protocols, already signed by the United States in December, 1929; and

Whereas one of these protocols, the protocol of accession including Mr. Root's formula for the operation of the fifth reservation concerning advisory opinions, accepts the Senate's 1926 reservations subject only to certain procedural agreements and without modification or change of the reservations themselves; and

Whereas by the report of Secretary Stimson to the President, "by these protocols the dangers which seemed to inhere in the rendering of advisory opinions by the court at the time the question was last presented to the Government in 1926 have now been entirely removed"; and

Whereas the Arkansas Bar Association has, at its last three meetings, consistently urged the adherence of the United States to the World Court: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Arkansas Bar Association, in meeting assembled on May 21, urges the Senate to give its consent to the ratification of these three protocols at the earliest practicable time in order that the Senate's resolution of 1926, providing for the adherence of the United States to the Permanent Court, may become effective.

ARKANSAS DEPARTMENT OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

Whereas the American Legion advocates the adherence of the United States to the Permanent Court of International Justice; and

Whereas steps toward this end have already been taken in the Senate's passage of the resolution providing for our adherence to the World Court; and

Whereas all that remains to put this resolution into effect and complete the adherence of the United States to the court is the Senate's ratification of the three World Court protocols, which the United States has already signed; and

Whereas it is the judgment of our National Committee on Foreign Relations that Mr. Root's formula, incorporated in the protocol accepting our Senate's reservations and offering a procedure for the Senate's fifth reservation concerning advisory opinions "fully protects the interests of the United States": Therefore be it

Resolved at a meeting of the Arkansas Legion, That we heartily approve the Senate's ratification of the three World Court protocols and hope that Senator ROBINSON and Senator CARAWAY, of Arkansas, will accurately reflect our hopes and those of thousands of their other constituents, in doing everything within their power to secure the ratification of the protocols.

ARKANSAS BAPTIST CONVENTION

Whereas the preservation of international peace is of the utmost concern to every citizen; and

Whereas it is peculiarly suitable for specifically Christian organizations to take a vigorous part in promoting the peaceful settlement of those disputes which are bound to arise between nations; and

Whereas the World Court is the outstanding agency for applying the principles of international law to the settlement of international disputes, as is indicated by the fact that the 36 decisions given by the court in the nine years of its existence have all been accepted by the nations involved; and

Whereas in 1926, the Senate, by a vote of 76 to 17, passed a resolution providing for our entrance into the World Court with five reservations; and

Whereas these reservations are, according to Secretary Stimson, entirely met by the three World Court protocols to which the signature of the United States has already been attached and which now await the Senate's ratification: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Arkansas Baptist convention, in meeting assembled hereby urges the Senate to ratify these three protocols at the earliest practicable time; and be it further

Resolved, That Senator ROBINSON be earnestly and respectfully requested to do everything in his power to further an early and favorable report upon the protocols from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, of which he is a member, since until that committee's report is submitted to the Senate, the Senate can not vote upon ratification.

ARKANSAS FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS

Believing that our great Nation should in these times of world-wide political and economic unrest and change take its necessary and rightful place of leadership toward world peace and international organization; and

Believing that the peaceful settlement of international disputes is a great and solemn pledge that binds our statesmen and to which the foreign policy of the United States is committed by the Kellogg-Briand pact; and

Believing that international cooperation is to-day a recognized condition of world peace, and to establish this the development of arbitration and conciliation is a first necessity, and that the rule of law must be made a common acceptance by all nations;

We, the Arkansas Federation of Women's Clubs in annual session assembled, reaffirm our State and general federations' allegiance to the great ideal of world peace and international cooperation; and

Respectfully and most earnestly urge our United States Senators, Senator ROBINSON and Senator CARAWAY, to give their full support and vote for the adherence of the United States to the World Court; and we further urge that the United States become a member of the World Court before the convening of the general disarmament conference in February.

It is further voted that a copy of this resolution be sent to Senator JOSEPH T. ROBINSON and Mrs. T. H. CARAWAY and to President Hoover and given to the press.

THE WOMAN'S CITY CLUB OF LITTLE ROCK

Whereas the President has sent to the Senate the protocols giving the adhesion of the United States to the World Court;

Therefore we urge upon our Senators that they exercise their powerful influence to secure their early adoption.

COOPERATIVE CLUB OF LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

It is hereby unanimously resolved by the Cooperative Club of Little Rock, Ark., That we look upon the World Court as one of the chief means of preserving peace and good will between nations, and that we petition our Senators to favor ratification of the treaties by which the United States gives its adhesion thereto.

POPE COUNTY BAR ASSOCIATION

Be it resolved by the Pope County Bar Association on this Tuesday, March 31, 1931, That we go on record as asking our Senators to vote in favor of our adhesion to the World Court, believing World Court is an American idea sponsored by some of our leading men in American history and because we think it would be the best thing for mankind.

BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL WOMEN'S CLUB OF EL DORADO, ARK.

The Business and Professional Women's Club of El Dorado, Ark., is very much interested in the completion of the adherence of the United States to the World Court, and we believe that now is the opportune time to make known our sentiment in this movement; we would therefore like to express to you, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate, our interest in the early ratification of the protocols.

KIWANIS CLUB OF LITTLE ROCK

It is hereby unanimously resolved by the Kiwanis Club of Little Rock, Ark., That we look upon the World Court as one of the chief means of preserving peace and good will between nations and that we petition our Senators to favor ratification of the treaty by which the United States gives in its adhesion thereto.

OTHER INTEREST IN THE WORLD COURT SHOWN IN ARKANSAS

During the years between 1926 and 1929, when negotiations with regard to our adherence to the World Court had lapsed, a number of important groups in this State urged the Senate to resume negotiations in order that our entry into the World Court might be completed. Letters and resolutions from the following bodies were sent to the Senate asking the resumption of negotiations:

Arkansas Bar Association; Arkansas Federation of Women's Clubs; Woman's Christian Temperance Union; Fort Smith Chamber of Commerce; Hot Springs Chamber of Commerce; Young Men's Christian Association of Little Rock; Arkansas American Association of University Women; Arkansas American Legion Auxiliary; Business and Professional Women's Clubs of Arkansas; City Federation of Clubs of Little Rock (membership, 4,000); Council of Jewish Women of Arkansas; Arkansas Young Women's Christian Association; National Young Women's Christian Association in Arkansas; Arkansas Parent-Teachers' Association; Missionary Societies of All Christian Churches in Arkansas; Missionary Society of First Methodist Church, Little Rock; Women's City Club, Little Rock; and Sorosis Club of the City of Magnolia, Ark.

In Fort Smith alone the following organizations have urged the entrance of the United States into the World Court:

Wednesday Club, Fortnightly Club, Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Delphian Society, Traveler's Aid, Sunshine Club, Catholic Daughters of America, and Public-School Teachers' Association.

CANADIAN TARIFF AND EXCHANGE

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I have here a letter dealing with the question of retaliatory tariffs and foreign exchange. I send it to the desk and ask unanimous consent to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading? The Chair hears none, and it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NORTHERN COAL COMPANY,
Detroit, December 11, 1931.

Hon. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: You are, of course, aware of the increased tariff, as well as the excise tax, invoked by Canada against our exports in her lightninglike reprisals to our Hawley-Smoot tariff.

But are you aware that with equal rapidity she issued a customs order on September 28, 1931, placing an additional duty against our commodities which at the time of writing is 17 per cent?

This September 28 customs ruling was her quick and snappy answer to the violently increased rate at which United States banks, commencing September 21, discounted Canadian funds. Its basis is the rate of such discount in effect on date of importation and applies to goods "of a class or kind produced in Canada."

Our banks contend that the exchange rate is due to "balance of trade" against Canada, but the discount rate, though higher at that time than formerly, was nevertheless only 2 to 3 per cent on Saturday, September 19, whereas it opened Monday, September 21 at 10 per cent, increasing to 20 per cent within the week. Canada could neither have purchased so tremendously of our goods on Sunday, September 20, as to justify Monday's 7 to 8 per cent increase, nor during the balance of that week to justify the 17 to 18 per cent increase.

It is significant that England went off the gold standard September 21, and the extent to which Canada's affiliation with the British Commonwealth of Nations is being used for exploitation of exchange may be a fit subject for investigation in view of its disastrous effect upon our foreign commerce and our industrial and employment situation.

Canada has not changed the standard of her currency which denominationally and otherwise is practically a counterpart of our own and in no way founded upon England's. Her affiliation with the British commonwealth is that of an independent unit, and aside from the fact that she is reputedly the world's second largest producer of gold, with other vast natural resources, she should be entitled as our, until recently, best customer to the better treatment deserved by a contiguous nation with ideals, living standards, scale of wages, and industrial development, the latter proportionate to population, comparable with our own.

Some few years ago during our industrial prosperity when the exchange rate threatened serious proportions remedial measures, designed to stabilize the rate at a maximum fluctuation of 1 per cent, were rumored, but apparently the need passed with the restoration of United States and Canadian currencies to approximate parity. If such a remedy exists, does not our present industrial and unemployment plight render its invocation doubly desirable now?

Canadian banks, among which we have heard of no failures during these trying times, are of recognized stability, and the history of United States-Canadian exchange invariably records the eventual return of the two currencies to near parity so that now, within their financing ability—

American exporters, seeking to avert the ruinous loss that would be entailed by the exchange discount incidental to their normal return to United States depositories, have in the aggregate deposited vast sums of Canadian funds received for commodities sold prior to the late September violent increase in the rate in Canadian banks.

American exporters of commodities "not of a class or kind produced in Canada," such, for example, as anthracite coal, and who must either continue accepting Canadian funds or sacrifice their Canadian trade to foreign competition with depreciated currencies, have deposited and are now depositing such funds received since late September and continually being received, in Canadian banks.

Americans, in the expectation of profiting with the expected return of United States-Canadian currencies to near parity, finding credit in the ratio of approximately $1,170 Canadian funds for $1,000 American funds obtainable in Canada at an equal rate of bank interest, have transferred deposits from United States banks to Canadian banks.

This drainage of our liquid funds threatens nullification of the beneficial effects toward liquefaction of United States banks generally expected of the National Credit Corporation, the proposed reconstruction corporation, the proposed establishment of home-loan discount banks, and other Federal remedial measures rendering them tantamount, unless the leak can be stopped, to pouring funds into this end of an open pipe line emptying into Canada.

This situation is naturally quite satisfactory to the majority of Canadians who appreciate its several advantages, of which the influx of United States funds is but one, but it is far from satisfactory to the exchange-burdened Canadian importer, to whom our commodities must look for a market, and he will not purchase any United States products at $1.17 per dollar that he can possibly get along without.

To digress, if a sales tax is enacted in response to agitation for it from some quarters, then unless our exported commodities are exempted, and by a method to render them permanently so, that will be another step toward the effacement of this country from the map as an exporting nation.

Respectfully,

E. C. CROWLEY, President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

INDORSEMENTS OF FEDERAL FARM BOARD ACTIVITIES

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have here certain resolutions forwarded to me by Jess W. Wade, secretary of the Intermountain Grain Growers (Inc.), asking that I submit them for printing in the RECORD and reference to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I do so now.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

OGDEN, UTAH, December 7, 1931.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Much comment has appeared in the press concerning the activities of the Federal Farm Board, the Grain Stabilization Corporation, the Farmers National Grain Corporation, and its allied agencies, and from this comment it seems probable that an attempt will be made to repeal the agricultural marketing act and limit the activities of the Federal Farm Board, as well as those groups cooperating with it.

Such a possibility has aroused the earnest attention of the farmers' organizations of the intermountain region, and accordingly boards of directors of the several local units of the Inter-Mountain Grain Growers (Inc.), as well as its own directors, have taken action to bring before you their opinion in the form of resolutions passed commending the operations of these governmental agencies to aid the interests of agriculture.

Copies of these resolutions have been prepared and we are presenting them herewith for your serious consideration when matters pertaining to the Federal Farm Board, the Grain Stabilization Corporation, the Farmers National Grain Corporation, and the agricultural marketing act come before Congress for its attention.

Yours very truly,

Resolution

It is hereby resolved, That the Madison County Grain Growers (Inc.) approve and appreciate the efforts of the Federal Farm Board and the Farmers National Grain Corporation. We urge that these organizations should be continued as at present.

The above resolution was passed at a regular meeting of the board of directors of Madison County Grain Growers (Inc.), held October 6, 1931.

MADISON COUNTY GRAIN GROWERS (INC.),
By J. S. WEBSTER, Secretary.

Resolution

Whereas the agricultural marketing act was passed by Congress for the purpose of aiding and assisting agricultural producers to organize and operate their own marketing cooperatives; and

Whereas the Federal Farm Board, created by the passage of the act, has very ably organized and assisted in the organization of grain cooperatives in the country; and

Whereas the Farmers National Grain Corporation was organized under the direction of the Farm Board and operated most successfully for the past 16 months for the distinct benefit of its producer members: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Power County Grain Growers (Inc.) do hereby extend a hearty vote of thanks and its whole-hearted support to the operations of the Federal Farm Board and the Farmers National Grain Corporation, and urge all cooperatives to support the Federal Farm Board movement.

I, Hyrum Lloyd, secretary of the Power County Grain Growers (Inc.), do hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of a resolution passed by the board of directors of the Power County Grain Growers (Inc.), in session October 8, 1931, and that same appears on the minute book of the corporation.

HYRUM LLOYD, Secretary.

Copy of resolution of commendation of the farm marketing act and the Federal Farm Board passed by the Arimo Grain Growers (Inc.), Arimo, Idaho

Whereas because of the great amount of opposition and misrepresentation, due to prejudice and misunderstanding, aimed at the Federal Farm Board because of its efforts to stabilize prices and protect the agriculture interests of the country during the last two years of economic stress in the United States, that is being circulated among farmers and people generally; and

Whereas it is probable that an attempt will be made by bankers, chambers of commerce, millers, and private enterprises to introduce legislation in the next Congress of the United States which will limit or annul the farm marketing act and abolish the Federal Farm Board, thus leaving agriculture communities and commodities at the mercy of the profiteers: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the directors of the Arimo Grain Growers (Inc.), for and in behalf of the stockholders of the aforesaid Arimo Grain Growers (Inc.), declare and we do hereby declare our approval of the actions of the Federal Farm Board in its efforts to stabilize prices and protect the agriculture pursuits of the country during the present depression. We earnestly desire the continuation of the farm marketing act and the Federal Farm Board, and will give our support and allegiance to the Federal Farm Board, the Farmers National Grain Corporation, and other agencies affiliated with them; be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be made a part of the minutes of this meeting and that a copy of it be sent to the Federal Farm Board, the Farmers National Grain Corporation, and our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

I, Lucian C. Farr, jr., do hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of a resolution passed at the board of directors meeting of the Arimo Grain Growers (Inc.), held at the company's office, Friday, October 2, 1931, at 8 p. m., at which all directors were present.

LUCIAN C. FARR, JR.,
Secretary-Treasurer.

Whereas the Federal Farm Board, created by the passage of the agricultural marketing act, has very ably assisted cooperative marketing associations in setting up and operating their organizations during the past two years; and

Whereas the Farmers National Grain Corporation, organized under the direction of the Federal Farm Board, has operated for the distinct benefit of its grain-grower members, as well as all grain growers; and

Whereas the Federal Farm Board and the Farmers National Grain Corporation will continue to aid and assist the grain growers and their cooperatives to market their produce to the best advantage possible: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Blue Creek Grain Growers (Inc.), for and on behalf of its stockholders, does hereby indorse the agricultural marketing act, the Federal Farm Board, and the Farmers National Grain Corporation, by lending our aid and support; be it further

Resolved, That we urge all other grain cooperatives to give their support and allegiance to these agencies.

I, Francis Norr, secretary of the Blue Creek Grain Growers (Inc.), do hereby certify that the foregoing resolution was passed by a majority of the members of the board of directors of said corporation at a regularly called meeting held on November 5, 1931.

FRANCIS NORR, Secretary.

Whereas the Federal Farm Board, through the activities of the Grain Stabilization Corporation, has acquired some 200,000,000 bushels of wheat over the past two years due to stabilization activities; and

Whereas in the face of unfair opposition of the grain trade and misinformed Congressmen and Senators, the Grain Stabilization Corporation has adopted a definite policy of disposing of this accumulation of wheat: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Inter-Mountain Grain Growers (Inc.) in session do hereby indorse and pledge their support to the policy adopted by the Grain Stabilization Corporation in handling the disposition of the wheat carried by it; be it further

Resolved, That, due to the high class of personnel at the head of the activities of the Federal Farm Board, the Grain Stabilization Corporation, and Farmers National Grain Corporation, the board of directors of the Inter-Mountain Grain Growers (Inc.) extends a hearty vote of confidence to the executive personnel of the Federal Farm Board, the Grain Stabilization Corporation, and Farmers National Grain Corporation.

STATE OF UTAH,
County of Weber, ss:

This is to certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution passed by the board of directors of the Inter-Mountain Grain Growers (Inc.), in session at Ogden, Utah, July 20, 1921, which resolution appears on the minute book of said association.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the corporate seal of the Inter-Mountain Grain Growers (Inc.) this 22d day of July, 1931.

JESS W. WADE, Secretary.

PROPOSED CASH BONUS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have a petition from the veterans of Erie County and the western portion of New York State, showing a vote they have taken on the cash bonus—6,500 votes in favor of it and 45 votes against it. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, the veterans of Erie County and the western portion of New York State whose names are signed to the accompanying ballots, which were voted in a straw ballot conducted under the sponsorship of radio station WEBR, Buffalo, N. Y., by Capt. William A. Fox, which straw ballot was conducted for the purpose of determining the sentiment in Erie County and western New York on the question of whether the adjusted-service certificates should be paid in full at this time, and which straw ballot resulted in a return of over 6,500 votes in favor of said full payment of the bonus certificates at this time and 45 opposed;

Do hereby petition the Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND and ROBERT F. WAGNER, Senators from the State of New York, and the Hon. JAMES M. MEAD, EDMUND F. COOKE, and WALTER G. ANDREWS, Congressmen from Buffalo and Erie County, to vote for and cooperate in passing the necessary legislation to effectuate the purposes of this petition in the form of legislation at the present session of Congress.

DISARMAMENT

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations a petition from the Parent-Teachers Association of Otego Central School favoring disarmament.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without all the signatures, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

OTEGO CENTRAL SCHOOL,
Otego, N. Y., November 5, 1931.

Senator ROBERT WAGNER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WAGNER: The members of our parent-teachers association are very much interested in world peace and we hope that you will do everything in your power to further it.

We petition you to approve and support only such delegates to the disarmament conference as shall favor and can ably support the cause of disarmament (through limitation of expenditure or otherwise) and good will and confidence between nations. We are especially anxious that the conference shall not be postponed.

We are also in favor of the United States joining the World Court.

Respectfully yours,

CELIA M. CROSWELL AND OTHERS.

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF GOVERNMENT SALARIES

Mr. WAGNER presented a resolution adopted by the United National Association of Post Office Clerks, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution of protest submitted to the Congress of the United States by the United National Association of Post-Office Clerks, C. P. Franciscus, president

Whereas the dreadful and distressing conditions existing throughout our Nation because of the inability of millions of our citizens to find employment and thereby earn sufficient money to purchase the necessary commodities of life; and

Whereas this condition has seriously impeded the free and healthy circulation of our money, has stagnated industry, paralyzed trade, and blighted commerce; and

Whereas the United National Association of Post-Office Clerks believes that these dreadful conditions are due in a great part to the failure of the leaders in the financial, commercial, and industrial interests to keep faith with President Herbert Hoover and to maintain their respective activities without curtailment and without reduction in compensation or salaries; and

Whereas the postal employees of the Nation, together with all other employees in the public service, were woefully underpaid until very recent years, received no salary increases throughout the trying years of 1917, 1918, and 1919, during which period the cost of living quadrupled and the purchasing power of the dollar shrunk almost 60 per cent; and

Whereas, notwithstanding these facts, the postal employees of the Nation, and we believe all employees in the public service, closed their eyes to the allurements of the outside world and remained loyally and faithfully at their posts in the Government service; and

Whereas we believe the Government should recognize and reward such devotion to duty, and that the Government should be the model employer, that its employees should be able to maintain their homes, rear and educate their children on the highest American standard, so that such employees will at all times reflect credit on the Nation to the end that private employers the country over would be inspired to pattern their policies after the Government's: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the United National Association of Post-Office Clerks of the United States, That we respectfully and earnestly petition the Congress of the United States to disapprove any suggestion, movement, or proposal looking to the reduction of salaries, whether temporarily or permanently, of the employees in the public service, to the end that the Government itself might be acclaimed and credited with being the first to assist in hastening the return of happiness, prosperity, and contentment to the American people.

RELIEF OF VETERANS OF ALL WARS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I present to the Senate tables showing appropriations made for the relief of the veterans of all wars for a 20-year period, namely, 1913 to 1932, both dates inclusive.

For this noble purpose, in this 20-year period, we have appropriated the sum of $11,197,542,082.01, of which $4,334,730,000 has gone for pensions to veterans and their widows and orphans, $4,373,527,025 for military and naval family allowance and compensation, insurance, and adjusted compensation, and $718,666,370 for vocational training, together with many millions for the support of the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

I believe that these tables show a record of wisdom and merit with a just recognition of the rights and welfare of our brave soldiers who willingly gave their all for the defense of our beloved country.

It is a record of which all American citizens should feel proud. I ask unanimous consent that these tables be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The tables are as follows:

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I also present current information showing activities of the Veterans' Administration with reference to soldiers and ask unanimous consent that the same printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ACTIVITIES OF VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION, OCTOBER 31, 1931

As of October 31, 1931, 42,121 veterans whose hospitalization was authorized by the Veterans' Administration were receiving treatment. Of this total, 7,564 were being hospitalized for tubercular ailments, 18,728 for neuropsychiatric diseases, and 15,829 for general medical and surgical conditions. To provide the care and treatment required by the above veterans the Veterans' Administration was utilizing 321 hospitals and homes, as follows:

Branch of service	Number of hospitals	Patients remaining
Veterans' Administration	65	32,354
U. S. Marine	17	932
U. S. Navy	16	4,267
U. S. Army	7	1,939
Department of Interior	2	332
Civil and State	214	2,297
Total	321	42,121

As of the above date there were 30,148 members on the rolls of the Veterans' Administration homes, and of this number 7,428 were absent.

In addition to hospital care and treatment, the Veterans' Administration also provides out-patient relief to veterans of the World War whose disabilities are such as not to require hospital treatment. During the year ended October 31, 1931, 838,845 out-patient treatments were given and a total of 2,138,258 physical examinations were made for all purposes.

As of October 31, 1931, 313,848 veterans were receiving compensation for disabilities incurred in, resulting from, or aggravated by military service during the World War. Compensation was also being paid to dependents of 96,787 veterans whose death occurred in or resulted from service in the World War. The amount of compensation payments, depending upon the degree of impairment, ranges from $8 per month for a temporary partial disability to $200 per month for a double permanent and total disability.

A general classification of disability by type shows the following per cent: Neuropsychiatric diseases, 21 per cent; tubercular ailments, 20 per cent; and general medical and surgical conditions, 59 per cent. The average monthly payment by type of disability is as follows: Neuropsychiatric diseases, $55.93; tubercular ailments, $61.67; and general medical and surgical conditions, $34.40. The average monthly payment for disability compensation, all types, is $44.28.

The number of active awards for disability compensation has increased 130,756 since June 30, 1923. The above increase distributed by the major types of disability is as follows: Neuropsychiatric diseases, 36,899; tubercular ailments, 20,654; general medical and surgical conditions, 73,205. The largest material increase during the above period is shown for veterans suffering from general medical and surgical conditions. However, the greatest per cent of increase is shown for neuropsychiatric diseases, the increase in this class being approximately 131 per cent, as compared with 50 per cent and 65 per cent for tubercular ailments and general medical cases, respectively.

July 2, 1926, an amendment was passed authorizing the payment of compensation at the rate of $50 per month to veterans who have had an active tubercular ailment which has reached a condition of complete arrest. As of October 31, 1931, 42,811 veterans were receiving compensation under this amendment.

As of May 24, 1928, the act was approved which provides for the retirement of emergency officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps who incurred physical disabilities in line of duty during the World War. This act provides that those officers who are rated not less than 30 per cent permanently disabled from disabilities resulting directly from war services or incurred in line of duty shall be retired with pay at a rate of 75 per cent of the pay to which they were entitled at the time of discharge from their commissioned service. As of October 31, 1931, 13,120 applications had been received, and of this number 6,902 had been retired with pay, 5,260 applications had been disallowed, and 951 had been retired without pay. The act further provided that the time limit for filing applications would expire 12 months after the passage of the act. However, 855 applications for retirement have been received subsequent to the expiration of the time indicated.

An amendment to the World War veterans' act was approved July 3, 1930, authorizing the payment of disability allowance to veterans of the World War for disabilities resulting from other than military and naval service which was not the result of the veterans' own willful misconduct. As of October 31, 1931, 664,236 applications for this type of benefit had been received, 580,901 of these claims had been adjudicated, and 294,286 veterans were receiving payment under the provisions of this amendment.

Monthly disbursements for compensation, emergency officers' retirement pay, and disability allowance cases were more than $21,000,000 for the fiscal year 1931. To October 31, 1931, the amount of $1,995,925,164 had been disbursed for these purposes. Pension benefits for veterans of all wars, including the Regular Establishment, are being paid to 255,269 soldiers, 542 nurses, and to the widows and dependents of 193,617 deceased soldiers. The average monthly disbursement for pensions was approximately $19,500,000 during the fiscal year 1931. During the period 1790 to October 31, 1931, the amount of $8,482,600,955 had been disbursed for this purpose.

As of October 31, 1931, term insurance was being paid in monthly installments to 12,914 permanently and totally disabled World War veterans and to the beneficiaries of 139,751 deceased veterans. In addition, 1-sum payments had been made to beneficiaries of 22,811 deceased veterans.

The benefits made available by the provisions of the World War adjusted compensation act have been extended to 3,865,276 veterans, or dependents of deceased veterans. The value of such benefits is $3,646,035,116. Of the above veterans, 3,608,694 have received adjusted-service certificates, which are equivalent to 20-year endowment insurance having a value of $3,600,595,339. The remaining veterans, or their beneficiaries, have received cash payments amounting to $41,756,940. Awards have been made on 113,119 adjusted-service certificates, amounting to $114,186,950, which have been matured by the death of the veteran.

An amendment to the World War adjusted compensation act, effective February 27, 1931, provides that the loan basis of adjusted-service certificates shall at no time be less than 50 per cent of the face value of the certificate, and the rate of interest on any loan made after the effective date of this amendment shall not exceed 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually. As of October 31, 1931, the Veterans' Administration had made loans direct to veterans, secured by their adjusted-service certificates, amounting to approximately $1,161,594,710. In addition to this amount, it is estimated that $75,000,000 is outstanding on loans made by banks.

Beginning with the act of March 3, 1919, the first legislation providing funds for the acquisition of hospital facilities for World War veterans, the Congress has to date authorized under eight general acts the sum of $113,327,000 for new hospital, domiciliary, and out-patient facilities, of which $97,450,000 had been appropriated to June 30, 1931. In addition, the Congress has over the same period authorized by special acts covering single projects the sum of $9,425,000 for new domiciliary and hospital construction at administration homes. Further, there has been expended since 1923 over $14,000,000 from regular fiscal funds for permanent improvements and extensions to veterans' hospitals.

A total of $14,810,349,455 had been disbursed as of October 31, 1931, for the relief of veterans of all wars, their dependents, or beneficiaries. Of this amount, $8,482,600,955 was paid for Army and Navy pensions from 1790 to date, and $251,531,475 was paid for hospitalization and domiciliary care in administration homes from 1867 to date. Of the total disbursements, $942,716,572 was made available by deduction for allotment from the pay of World War veterans while in service, and from amounts collected as premiums on the various forms of Government insurance.

"BUSINESS DEFEATISM AND ECONOMIC RECOVERY"—ADDRESS BY DR. GLENN FRANK

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, some time ago there was delivered in this city an able address on the subject of "Business Defeatism and Economic Recovery," by Dr. Glenn Frank, president of the University of Wisconsin. As certain parts of the address bear a direct relation to the payment of war debts and related subjects, I ask permission to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Doctor Frank spoke as follows:

I

The French have a word, "defaitiste," to describe the man who in spirit or policy or procedure makes for his country defeat in time of war, and in war time a nation's defeatists are kept under strict observation. I suggest that America has just now a growing body of business defeatists upon whom the Nation could profitably keep a weather eye.

The supreme battle of this generation is on just now in business circles between the deflationists and the consumptionists. The deflationists are those business leaders who think that the way out of the current economic muddles lies in reducing the standards of living. The consumptionists are those business leaders who think that the way out of the current economic muddle lies in raising the standards of living.

This is, I know, an oversimplified definition alike of deflationism and of consumptionism, but it does have the merit of cutting through a thousand and one details to the heart of the difference between these two major camps of business leadership that to-day confront one another.

The deflationists of to-day are blood brothers of the inflationists of yesterday, and they are just as bat blind to economic and social realities. The inflationists of yesterday brought the stock market to collapse. The deflationists of to-day will bring our entire business system to collapse if they succeed in seducing the majority of American business men, bankers, and industrialists, to their point of view. To speak with brutal frankness—and the times call for that sort of speaking—the deflationists are, in my judgment, little men riding in big saddles, seeking to lead a business army to which they have nothing to bring except the strategy of their fear. They are big business men who have fallen short of being big business men.

It is of this problem of the conflict between the deflationists and the consumptionists in relation to the current economic depression that I want now to speak.

Along the entire frontier of western civilization the forces that have made for the collapse of markets, the retardation of economic enterprise, and the unsettlement of mass confidence in current leadership are to-day challenging the worth and the workability of the western economic order. And in the midst of this world-wide economic depression the forces of education and the forces of industry are occupying the two most heavily shelled sectors of the western world's social battle line. We do not yet know what the outcome of this challenge and of this contest will be. The forces of education and the forces of industry may be beaten into panic retreat by the disintegrative forces of revolution or by the integrative forces of dictatorship. The captains of education and the captains of industry may rest content with defensive tactics, dig themselves more deeply in, and do no more than hold their own for some time to come. Or they may evolve a fresh strategy of advance and move forward to new conquests of economic prosperity and social good.

I am not foolhardy enough to venture a prophet's guess among these three possibilities. I am content to say that I think the third outcome is possible, and that it lies very largely with the leadership of education and the leadership of industry to say whether or not it shall be realized.

The United States is, at the moment, in the midst of the most serious economic crisis in its history. Even with markets tumbling about our ears and with salesmen reluctantly reporting their quotas unfilled, there is, save for the bread lines in our congested centers, a bright delusive air of well-being among our people that tends to hide from the average American the deeper significance of the depression through which we are passing. We have known phases of slowing down in which the American people, as a whole, were on a lower level of living than now, but in its basic character the current depression is unlike and more serious than any depression that has preceded it. It is the first general crisis that has befallen us since our machine economy has come to measurable maturity. It is not a matter of momentary maladjustment in any one section of the world. It is not a matter of momentary speculative mania disrupting an otherwise statesmanlike and stable economic program. There is nothing to be gained by beating about the bush. The entire economic order of the western world has reached an impasse from which only the most clear-headed, creative, and courageous educational, industrial, and political leadership can extricate it.

II

That this is not the facile generalization of a frightened academician is proved, I think, by four obvious but all too generally overlooked aspects of this depression, viz:

First. The current economic depression is not simply American; it is world-wide. I call a partial roll of the areas that are, in varying degrees, to-day feeling the impact of one aspect or another of economic depression: The United States, Great Britain, Canada, India, Australia, Germany, Italy, Sweden, Switzerland, Poland, Czechoslovakia, the East Indies, the Netherlands, Mexico, Chile, Peru, Brazil, Argentina, and so on. We are in the presence, gentlemen, of a world phenomenon. The Americas, Europe, Asia, Africa, and the Antipodes—all stand to-day as if some subtle spell of economic witchcraft had been put upon them.

Second. The current economic depression is not simply a financial depression; it is industrial as well. We should to-day be wrestling with forces of economic retardation even if there had been no black October in the 1929 operations of the stock exchange. The market debacle was but an eddy in a major current of economic tendency. In the United States significant sections of industry, such as the automobile industry, had been reaping the easy harvest of a first-sale market and were beginning to reach the point at which, by and large, the market was settling down to a matter of replacements and of meeting the new needs created by normal growth of population or by radically new departures in design, quality, and price. American business and industry were catching up on the postponed building and buying that had kept the air electric with enterprise in the immediate postwar decade. Various artificial stimuli to business, such as installment buying and the mania for annual models, were rounding out their pioneer push and settling down to a normal pace of development. And throughout the world the potential energies of the machine age were beginning to feel the irrational restrictions of tariffs and trade policies that had been created by an obsolete political leadership, tariffs and trade policies that stood and still stand in utter violation of the clear conclusions of common sense and of all the canons of constructive statesmanship. The current depression is more than a faux pas of the financiers, it is a kind of judgment day for industrial leadership. We might reform the stock exchange and still the ghost of this depression would not down, for it sinks its roots in all the policies and processes of our industrial order.

Third. The current depression is not simply financial and industrial in its scope; it is agricultural as well. I need not, I am sure, argue this assertion. Alongside the world-wide industrial depression there is a world-wide agricultural depression, again emphasizing the fact that the phenomenon we are facing goes to the very foundations of the economic order of the West in particular and of the world in general. The agricultural aspect of the current depression strikes, with utter impartiality, exporting and importing countries alike. Such exporting countries as the United States, Canada, and Australia are hit by an agricultural depression due primarily to economic and secondarily to political causes. Such importing countries as Germany and England are hit by an agricultural depression due primarily to political and secondarily to economic causes. For every existing agricultural surplus in any part of the world there are somewhere in another part of the world undernourished bodies enough to absorb it. But we seem not to be able to muster a statesmanship that can lift the peoples of these areas of underconsumption to the level of paying customers and bring the supply into contact with the need. And so we must admit a bankruptcy of leadership and shame ourselves by confessing a world-wide agricultural depression that would be unthinkable to a really intelligent race.

Fourth. The current economic depression is not marked by an overproduction of manufactured goods alone; it is marked by an overproduction of raw materials as well. In the last decade or two there has been a staggering increase in the production of raw materials and foodstuffs. From 1909 to 1914 the average world production of sugar was 19,363,000 short tons. By 1929 it had jumped to 29,970,000 tons, or, roughly, a 50 per cent increase. In less than two decades the United States increased its wheat acreage from 47,000,000 to 61,000,000 acres, while Australia and Canada more than doubled theirs. The world had a full year's supply of coffee on hand when this year's crop was ready for harvest. The world output of tea jumped in four years from 856,000,000 to 945,000,000 pounds. Rubber jumped from 51,000 to 68,000 long tons. From 1926 to 1929 the world output of tin jumped from 145,000 to 195,000 metric tons, lead from 1,606,000 to 1,775,000 metric tons, zinc from 1,245,000 to 1,470,000 metric tons, and copper from 1,485,000 to 1,908,000 metric tons. This expansive output of raw materials is again a world-wide phenomenon. From 1910 to 1914 Australia's average wheat production was 90,497,000 bushels. Twelve years later it had jumped to 160,762,000 bushels. In 1913 Australia's wool production was 711,500,000 pounds. In 1927 it had jumped to 883,304,000 pounds. In 1913 Chile's output of copper was 93,147,000 pounds. In 1928 it had jumped to 528,487,000 pounds. And even in the face of the rapid development of synthetic nitrates in Germany, England, and the United States, the output of Chilean nitrates jumped from 2,772,000 metric tons in 1913 to 3,163,000 metric tons in 1928. I take these figures, more or less at random, and with no attempt to paint a complete picture, in order to emphasize the fact that the current glut of manufactured goods is not the whole story of the current depression.

We are face to face, then, with a phase of economic depression that is world-wide in scope; financial, industrial, and agricultural in character; and marked by a sluggish surplus alike of manufactured goods and of raw materials. But to-day I want to do no more than suggest a point of view respecting the industrial depression in the United States, and say what I think it implies by way of challenge to the leadership of education and the leadership of industry.

III

As the United States swung into the closing months of 1929 our machine order was never more efficient, from the point of view of potential productive capacity, but our economic order found itself swamped rather than served by the efficiency of the machine order. (I use these terms "machine order" and "economic order" in a more severely separate and limited sense than the technical economists use them. By the machine order I mean the whole array of processes by which we make goods and produce wealth; by the economic order I mean the whole array of policies by which we use goods and distribute wealth.) Never was there less defensible excuse for economic depression than in the closing months of 1929. There was no shortage of money. There was no shortage of basic resources. There was no lack of willing hands to work. There was no lack of productive efficiency. There was no plaguelike adversity of wind or weather. There was no insect pest, either nation-wide in its ravages or seriously out of hand. There was no invader hammering at our gates to terrify our spirits and to disrupt the normal processes of our enterprise.

On the contrary! There was an ample money supply. There was a surplus of nearly all basic resources. There were millions of workers ready to work. The productive efficiency of the Nation was such that the needs of its people and much besides could have been easily supplied with shorter working days and a shorter working week. At no moment in human history had a people found itself in possession of so nearly all of the material essentials for a great and glowing civilization. It was at such a moment that the United States found the shadow of a serious economic depression falling athwart its life.

At the very moment when the market collapse and economic retardation befell it the United States was basically at the point toward which the dreams of prophets and seers have pointed through the centuries. As we reread the literature of Utopian thought and list the things that the social seers have with striking unanimity set down as elementary requirements of an ideal society we find that the United States was in position to provide them all in the closing months of 1929. It had invented machines enough to emancipate its people from drudgery. It had achieved a productive efficiency that made possible the production of everything its people needed without their slaving from dawn to dusk. Leisure in which to laugh and love and adventure among things of the mind and spirit was within the Nation's grasp.

And yet, just when we had reached the point at which emancipation from drudgery, the capacity to produce all the essentials of material well-being without the slavery of inhuman hours, and the potential achievement of prosperity and leisure for all were at hand, we found ourselves victimized by a financial debacle, an economic recession, and a vast social unsettlement in which men walked hungry in the midst of plenty. What must the gods have thought as they watched this tragi-comedy!

I do not want to join the oversimplifiers and bring a false clarity to a situation that is admittedly complex. The cause of the current economic situation can not be captured in a phrase nor its cure distilled in an epigram. But one thing is, I think, sun clear: The leadership that has developed our policies for using goods and distributing wealth has proved inferior to the leadership that has developed our processes for making goods and producing wealth. We can not, of course, tear the machine order and the economic order apart in our thinking. They are too intimately interlocked. But in the deepest sense I think it is accurate to say that the current depression is, in essence, an indictment, not of the machine order but of the economic order.

IV

Let me translate these abstract observations into concrete terms. It is by now a threadbare platitude—even if a young platitude—to say that our machine economy is in trouble because our capacity to purchase has not kept pace with our capacity to produce.

Following the war some of the more far-sighted leaders of American business and industry adopted a new credo that said a stable and widely distributed prosperity and healthy industrial development required high wages, short hours, and low prices. This ran contrary to the naïve business thinking of earlier generations, that said low wages, long hours, and high prices made for maximum profit. But outstanding industries throughout the United States proved by their balance sheets that high wages, short hours, and low prices were not only good for the masses but good for the manufacturers. And we are in the grip of depression now, not because we followed this new credo of business, but because we did not follow it generally enough or apply it far enough.

The simple fact is that a machine economy must, along with the making of commodities, see to it that the consuming millions have money with which to buy and leisure in which to enjoy the products the machine economy creates. And that means higher wages than we have yet paid, shorter hours than we have yet set, and lower prices than we have yet fixed. Our machine economy is to-day sinking us in a sea of surplus production that could, if we were statesmanlike enough, be used to the advantage of ourselves and of the world. I decline to concur with the observers who insist that we are producing too many goods. There are 120,000,000 of us in this Nation, and as a people we have far from satisfied the legitimate demands of a healthy and civilized folk. There is a whole world outside our frontiers in which millions upon millions of men and women are living far below the consumption level we have known and that health and civilized values dictate. If we are at all sensitive to the physical and spiritual needs of humanity, to say that we are now or shall be for generations to come at a point where humanity is surfeited with goods and services it does not need for better living is to me too incredible to consider seriously.

But that we are producing more goods than the consuming millions are able to purchase is obvious. Production and consumption are seriously out of balance. There are two obvious ways to deal with this disturbed balance between production and consumption. We can slow down production by deliberate policy or we can speed up consumption by deliberate policy. I shall not attempt to disguise my conviction that to throw the brakes on our productive capacity would be a coward's policy and a social retreat. We have evolved a machine economy that can, if we will but bring a far-sighted statesmanship to its direction, emancipate the race from drudgery, lift the standard of physical well-being throughout the world, and give mankind at last leisure in which to cultivate values that lie beyond economics. But the machine economy will never do these things unless and until the leadership of industry sees to it that a larger share of the national income is shifted into the pockets of the consuming millions and until the margin of leisure for the millions is markedly increased. And if and when the leadership of industry assumes as one of its major duties increasing the income and the leisure of the millions, it will discover that as a by-product of this statesmanlike social ministry it has made greater profits than ever before.

A simple and single challenge lies coiled at the heart of this depression: Will the leadership of industry prove as capable in producing civilized consumers as it has proved itself capable in producing consumable commodities? Unless it does, industrial leadership must resign itself to the certainty that our machine economy will slump into chronic depression and ultimate collapse.

V

The logic of events is at last proving that the basic policies that will prove best for labor are the policies that will prove best for capital, and vice versa. It is at last evident that it is to the best interests of business that a larger share of the national income shall find its way into the hands of the masses who buy consumable commodities.

It is obviously self-defeating for business to get itself into the position to produce vast quantities of goods unless at the same time it sees to it that there are vast masses of potential consumers ready with money to buy and leisure in which to use the goods that business produces.

In the entire history of business America, every general reduction of hours and every general rise in wages, however bitterly fought by business and industrial leadership at the time, has been followed by a fresh accession of business activity and general prosperity. It is one of the ironies of history that the very things for which labor and liberalism have pleaded through the generations, on the ground of simple social justice, namely, high wages, short hours, low prices, are now seen to be the only things that can, in the interest of the solvency of capitalism, keep our industrial order a going concern.

In the field of education the narrow specialist has broken down in the face of a crisis that only the broadly educated man, who can see things steadily and see them whole, could master.

In the field of industry, the machine order—which makes goods and produces wealth—has been astoundingly successful, only to find its success turned into defeat because the economic order—which has to do with using goods and distributing wealth—has not been able to make wise use of the marvelous efficiency of the machine order for the benefit of all.

By a thousand superficial tests our captains of education and our captains of industry have been successful during the decade just closed, but in the deeper sense they failed when faced with the crucial test of their careers, namely, the prevention of the current economic depression. And before they can again lay claim to success they must help us do two things, viz:

First. They must help us make our universities once more educational institutions as well as training stations for narrow specialists.

Second. They must help us make our economic order as socially efficient in its policies for using goods and distributing wealth as they have made our machine order technologically efficient in its processes for making goods and producing wealth.

VI

During the last few months, before significant bodies of business, industrial, and financial leaders, I have made the statements I am making here, the essence of which is:

If we are to insure the solvency and success of our industrial system, we must see to it that a larger share of the national income is shifted into the pockets of the consuming millions and that the margin of leisure for the millions is markedly increased in order that the masses may have money with which to buy and leisure in which to enjoy the vast flood of goods and services our magnificent machine economy is able to produce.

Twenty years ago or less this statement would have been set down as the envious and irresponsible raving of a disinherited radical. But experience—the experience of the last year—has taught many men many things. This statement has brought to my desk a flood of letters, many of them from the undisputed leaders of American business, industry, and finance, and to date the file of these letters contains but three dissenting opinions, and not one of these was from a great business leader. If I were free to quote the contents of these personal letters, the Nation might get a new idea of some of the men at the top of the industrial order.

What is it that has led the best brains of the business and industrial world to agree that a contention considered dangerously radical 20 years ago is to-day the soundest of sound business policy? It is surely not because the big business man has turned bolshevik.

Let me try to state the case briefly. When various important industries began to slow down production in 1929 it was not because there was a lack of purchasing power in the country, but only because there was a lack of purchasing. Here is the great paradox of our industrial civilization: At the very moment when a slump in purchasing left industries with excess products there existed in the country far more than enough purchasing power to absorb all of these excess products and to call for still greater production. Why, then, did not this purchasing power come into play? Not until we know the right answer to this question will we be in position to devise workable ways and means of bringing this adequate purchasing power back into play. To me, one of the important parts of the answer is sun clear. The reason that this surplus purchasing power was kept out of active circulation was that it existed, in large part, as a social surplus that was not, from a broad national and even business point of view, properly distributed. This inactive surplus purchasing power was, in large part, in the hands of a small minority who, for personal and family consumption, neither needed nor desired to buy more; while the large majority, who for personal and family consumption both needed and desired to buy more did not have much, if any, excess purchasing power.

During the last six months I have talked with a score of conservative big business men who agree that this is, as far as the factors under our immediate control are concerned, the root fact of our current economic situation. And they say frankly that the biggest job confronting the leadership of American business and industry is what to do about the wiser distribution of this social surplus of purchasing power.

The key to national prosperity is the release of the present inactive social surplus of buying power. And a score of America's outstanding business men, bankers, and industrialists have, as I have already suggested, told me that if a larger share of this social surplus could be wisely routed into the pockets of the consuming millions who, for personal and family consumption, both need and desire to buy more, the wheels of industry and the marts of trade would quickly begin to hum with new activity, economic depression would become a memory throughout the United States, and that, in the long run, the minority now owning this surplus buying power would actually be better off as far as total wealth is concerned.

The key problem of the United States is, if I may repeat, the problem of a wise and businesslike redistribution of social buying power. Large-scale charity does a little of this redistributing. Unemployment insurance does a little more. A gigantic program of public works, financed by governmental bonds, bought by those who now have a large part of our inactive surplus buying power, and the interest and retirement of these bonds financed by taxation of this inactive surplus of buying power would go still farther in this essential redistribution of surplus buying power. A dozen governmental devices come readily to mind.

But I should like to think that we can effect this imperative redistribution of social buying power through far-sighted business, industrial, and financial leadership, without resorting to political force. And never since I have had personal contact with representative leaders of American business and industry have so many of them been giving so much serious thought to this key problem as they are to-day.

A statesmanlike administration of the triple problem of wages, hours, and prices can go far toward resolving the economic dilemma that now confronts industrial and business America. If business and industrial and financial leadership faces fresh problems with fresh minds and becomes really convinced that only prosperous consumers make profitable customers, we can create on this continent a contented and prosperous people, immune to the allurement of reckless radicalisms. But if business, industrial, and financial leadership misses this appointment with destiny, our economic order will smash, and sooner or later the inarticulate millions of America will seek to achieve through political means what our economic order has failed to achieve for them through its normal leadership.

VII

The gist of what I have tried to say is that our panicky present is the result of our planless past. If we isolate any particular enterprise in economic America, we may find that it has been managed admirably, but if we look for general economic statesmanship, we look in vain. If we permit the present to be as planless as the past has been, if we content ourselves with hastily improvised policies to jack up morale or hastily improvised protests to provide stump-speech copy for the next campaign, we shall find ourselves citizens of a fear-ridden future in which we shall be dragged at the heels of forces and fears over which we shall be able to exert no more control than we exerted over the forces that brought a bloated market to explosion in the fall of 1929.

This fear-ridden and uncontrolled future need not be. There is genius enough in America to evolve and to execute political and economic policies that will give us a future that will, in point of material well-being and social enrichment, far outstrip the very real, if somewhat spotty prosperity of the last decade. If America does not realize this finer and more fruitful future and begin her realization of it with decent promptness, it will be either because at the top we suffer a breakdown of industrial, political, and educational statesmanship or because at the bottom the people, in a moment of leaderless confusion, fanatically follow some false prophet from either the ultrareactionary or the ultraradical camp. It will not be because the cards of destiny are stacked against us. They are not. Every card in the deck is in our hands. It is a matter of playing them expertly.

WORK OF THE TARIFF COMMISSION

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter from Henry P. Fletcher, late chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, inclosing a memorandum summarizing the work of that commission since its reorganization.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter and memorandum are as follows:

NOVEMBER 17, 1931.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I hereby tender my resignation as chairman and member of the United States Tariff Commission, effective November 30 next.

I inclose a memorandum summarizing the work accomplished since the commission was reorganized 14 months ago. This memorandum shows that, with one or two exceptions, all the investigations requested by Senate or House resolutions have been completed. The petroleum, copper, and vegetable-oil investigations are in final form and will be submitted, as requested by the resolutions, to the Congress when it assembles next month. The most important investigation now pending is that relating to raw and refined sugar, which was recently ordered and which in the nature of the case may be protracted, as growing as well as refining costs both at home and abroad are involved. Work on this and all other pending applications and investigations is proceeding as rapidly as circumstances permit.

The recent depreciation in exchange in a number of countries exporting to the United States has rendered our cost data, secured before these countries departed from the gold standard, inapplicable in view of the present instability of exchange values and negative reports were sometimes unavoidable in cases where the exchange factor entered. The facts gained in our investigations, however, are all assembled and can be utilized in case further investigation may become necessary.

The commission has been completely reorganized and is, I believe, thoroughly equipped to perform its important functions.

It is a pleasure to express my appreciation of the loyal and efficient cooperation and support I have received from my colleagues on the commission and from every member of its staff.

Faithfully yours,

HENRY P. FLETCHER.

NOVEMBER 17, 1931.

MEMORANDUM WORK OF THE UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION

Since the Tariff Commission was reorganized its work may be briefly summarized as follows:

By November 30, the effective date of the chairman's resignation, 39 separate rate investigations, covering a very large number of items and different rates of duty, will have been completed and reported upon under section 336 of the tariff act. Eleven important surveys (not involving rate changes) will also have been completed.

Of the 9 investigations discontinued, 8 were dismissed by Senate resolutions; 5 applications were withdrawn by proponents; 28 applications were dismissed by the commission after careful preliminary investigation; thus 92 cases will have been disposed of.

There remains on the commission calendar 10 rate investigations and 1 survey, all in response to Senate resolutions, and 8 rate investigations of other origin, making a total of 19 investigations and surveys in progress.

Twenty-one applications for investigations are on file, some of which may be granted and some denied, depending upon the facts developed by preliminary investigation by the commission.

Thus the commission has 40 investigations, surveys, and applications on its books, compared with 92 disposed of since reorganization.

The commission is, of course, engaged in other routine work assigned to it, including the American-valuation study called for under section 340 of the tariff act of 1930, investigations under section 337, surveys, etc.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 17, 1931.

Hon. HENRY P. FLETCHER,
United States Tariff Commission,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CHAIRMAN FLETCHER: I have your letter of November 17 tendering your resignation as chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, to be effective November 30.

In accepting it I wish to express the keen appreciation I have for the great public service you have rendered. Under your chairmanship the work of the commission has made great progress in consummation of the hopes which were placed in its reorganization and increased authority. That a large number of cases have been considered and disposed of and the heavy docket for the year almost completed, all bespeak the devotion and effectiveness of the commission's work.

Yours faithfully,

HERBERT HOOVER.

ADDRESS BY GEN. HARVEY H. HANNAH

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the annual address of Gen. Harvey H. Hannah, president of the National Association of Railroad and Utilities Commissioners, delivered at Richmond, Va., on October 20, 1931.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

RAILROADS AND UTILITIES

Ladies and gentlemen, when I assumed the presidency of this great organization at Charleston I found it in the very highest state of efficiency, and that the most cordial and friendly relationships possible existed as between the respective State commissions throughout the entire Union. This was due primarily to the magnificent personnel composing the organization and the distinguished executives whom I have had the privilege and honor to succeed. I, therefore, felt that I was taking over a perfect seagoing ship, and the only question that weighed heavily upon my heart was whether I would be able to guide it from the bridge successfully and pilot it through any storms that might arise until we might drop anchor in 1931 in the harbor of the magnificent city of Richmond, the capital of the Old Dominion. Without regard to the success of the voyage we are here to-day peacefully resting at anchor.

Upon assuming the presidency I found that our pending Federal legislation looking to the regulation of motor carriers, known to us as the Parker bill, had been lost in the last closing hours of the Congress, notwithstanding the fact that our organization, through its legislative committee, headed by that tireless worker and distinguished commissioner from Wisconsin, Andrew J. McDonald, and our equally distinguished solicitor, John E. Benton, have spent six long years in trying to bring about proper Federal legislation to provide regulation of interstate motor operations, which would preserve to the States their sovereign rights and at the same time establish proper coordination of carriers through cooperation with the Federal Government under such legislation as would place both interstate and intrastate operations of all kinds upon the same legal and equitable basis.

There has, therefore, been no Congress in which this legislation could be accomplished during my term of office, growing out of the fact that it was caught in a jam in the closing days of the last Congress. However, in my opinion, I have appointed strong men and those especially qualified for service on all of the various committees of the association, and they no doubt have made exhaustive studies, not only of interstate transportation but also of all other possible Federal legislation as to interstate traffic touching such vital questions as pipe lines, electric transmission lines, telephone lines, and kindred subjects. And I am hopeful and confident that out of their study and the discussions at this convention there may be evolved a program for such legislation as may be needed, and that my distinguished successor may see his efforts crowned with success and that the next Congress may write this remedial legislation as a part of the law of the land.

The most important event during my presidency, and one involving all of the States, is the whole-hearted cooperation between the Interstate Commerce Commission and the various State commissions, growing out of the petition filed by the rail carriers of the country for a 15 per cent horizontal increase in all freight rates as an emergency measure. Upon the filing of this petition the Interstate Commerce Commission invited the State commissions to cooperate; and believing in the sound and wise policy of cooperation between the States and the Federal Government, this invitation was accepted. We formed a cooperative committee and under the leadership of the distinguished chairman of that committee, Hon. Paul Walker, of Oklahoma, the States were divided into groups, each group in turn selecting a representative to sit in with the Interstate Commerce Commission in the hearing of this very important and far-reaching case. The State commissioners so selected were Paul Walker, of Oklahoma (chairman); Andrew J. McDonald, of Wisconsin; William J. Carr, of California; J. M. Thompson, of Idaho; Herbert W. Trafton, of Maine; William D. B. Ainey, of Pennsylvania; Hugh H. White, of Alabama; and Harvey H. Hannah, of Tennessee.

The first hearing was held in Washington in July, where the carriers and their security holders presented their petition and their proof in chief. At the conclusion of their presentation the Interstate Commerce Commission deemed it best to send certain of its representatives to sit with these State commissioners in different sections of the country to hear such proof as might be offered by the shippers in opposition to the proposed increase in rates, thereby affording to the shippers in the various parts of the country easier access to the Interstate Commerce Commission to offer their proof, so as not to be required to travel from all sections of the United States to Washington to be heard. Hearings were had at Portland, Me., Atlanta, Ga., Dallas, Tex., Kansas City, Mo., Salt Lake City, Utah, San Francisco, Calif., and finally a general hearing for the great Northwest and Mississippi Valley was held in Chicago to conclude the proof on both sides of the controversy. At all of these hearings the State commissions were represented by the commissioners selected in their respective groups. The concluding hearing was in Washington, beginning on September 21, for the purpose of presentation of arguments to the entire Interstate Commerce Commission and the cooperating State commissioners. These arguments lasted practically 10 days, after which conferences lasting 2 days were held by the Federal and State commissions.

At the time of the preparation of this address no decision has been handed down by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and therefore the observance of a due regard for the ethics of the occasion would prevent my going further or in any wise discussing at this time the opinions entertained by the different State commissioners as expressed at the hearing, nor can I be permitted with propriety to forecast the probable ultimate decision which may be rendered by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

There are, however, three observations which I want to make, growing out of the handling of this case, which in no wise pertain to its decision:

First. The splendid loyalty and patriotic service rendered by the representatives of the State commissions during the long, hot summer without any extra compensation and with practically all of them having to spend more money out of their private funds than could be repaid by their States. I take this occasion to express to these faithful servants of the people my deepest and sincerest gratitude for their untiring interest and magnificent service.

Second. This summer's work in this case has demonstrated more forcefully than in any other case heretofore the wisdom of closer cooperation between the States and the Federal commission. In every way possible the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and every member extended every courtesy and showed every consideration that could be hoped for or expected by the State commissions, and I wish, on behalf of my colleagues as well as on behalf of this great association, to express our appreciation as representatives of the sovereign States of the American Union.

Third. This hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission, in Ex parte 103, on application of the rail carriers, has demonstrated to all who have heard or become familiar with the proof that motor transportation, both passenger and freight, has come to stay, and is expanding day by day until it has already become one of the great factors in the evolution of transportation. Motor vehicles; pipe lines conveying gas, gasoline, oil, etc.; and water transportation, taken together in their respective fields, are furnishing real competition to the steam railroads of America. There are many reasons why this is true, but they will be discussed more at length by representatives of the respective committees covering these subjects. The outstanding fact, however, remains that there must be regulation of interstate commerce covering these agencies of transportation. There must be a coordination of transportation agencies, both State and national, so that the commerce of the country may move at the lowest rates that are reasonable, and, at the same time, give a proper return on the property used and useful in the public service. This is the great problem now before the American people, made more acute by the general depression, which for the last two years has lain upon the country and the whole world like a blighting mildew.

As regards the operation of motor vehicles, pipe lines for gas and transmission lines for electricity, these subjects can be differentiated from the interstate commerce involved in rail transportation, because of the fact that a large percentage of the rail transportation is national in character, involving the crossing of many State lines, whereas, as to electricity, it is extremely rare that the generation shall take place in one State and that the electricity shall be transmitted over more than one State boundary, and as to natural gas and motor-bus transportation, the boundaries of more States may be involved, but the matter of regulation in the very natur of things is to a great extent regional in character and does not present a problem of national importance as does rail transportation.

Without going into detail in regard to methods of regulation, permit me to say that a report was made to the American Bar Association by one of its very able committees at its Atlantic City meeting in September last, which is very illuminating and to which I refer. Giving due credit to the committee which prepared and submitted that report, I shall content myself by quoting a paragraph therefrom which contains a possible solution of the questions we are considering.

"Several solutions have been proposed. (1) Create a series of compacts between various States affected by interstate operations so as to permit such States by means of a joint commission to regulate the interstate commerce involved. (2) Have Congress create regional commissions subordinate to either the Federal Power Commission or to the Interstate Commerce Commission, to be made up either of commissioners from the commissions of the several States in such region or of independent Federal appointees. (3) Continue the present system of leaving unregulated the interstate commerce involved, but have the State commissions deal with problems affecting the neighboring States by consultive and joint action with the commissions of the neighboring States, (4) Have Congress enact legislation specifically divesting electricity and gas transmitted in interstate commerce of its interstate character immediately prior to the sale to the distributing company, thus making its sale subject to regulation in the State of purchase."

The able report of this committee takes up in detail a discussion of the methods, outlined above, for regulation of operations in interstate commerce and cites decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in support of each one of these methods of regulation. I commend this report to the careful consideration of any member of this association who may care to take the time and trouble to give any thought and study to these questions.

The champions of centralized government and of federalization of the agencies of regulation, who advocate stripping the States, so far as possible, of their sovereign rights which would make them only outlying provinces as it were, will find little comfort, if they will take a survey of the Nation as it stands to-day in the shadow of the greatest financial crisis in its history, when they find that the utilities corporations, which are solely under State regulation, are weathering the storm better than are all other agencies of commerce and trade and that their securities have depreciated less than various other securities on the market to-day. This, in my opinion, grows out of the fact that the State regulatory bodies, in a vast majority of the States, must under the law pass upon the issuance of bonds and stocks of these various utility corporations and these issues are always kept within the limit of sound financing and below the rate base, which is the actual valuation of the physical properties of the corporations which are used and useful in the public service. In other words, the valuation adopted for security issues reflects what the property is actually and honestly worth with all of the water squeezed out. It is a reflection of the honest dollars prudently invested to build the property plus all other elements that go in, under the law, to make up the actual value upon which the utility may have a return and at the same time give the people the best service at the lowest rates possible.

These conditions demonstrate the wisdom of vesting in the State commissions, which are in touch with the people, in touch with the local utilities, and in touch with local financial conditions, the control over the issuance of utility securities; and they further demonstrate the wisdom of local or State regulation, which affords to the people who have just cause for complaint a local agency, easy of access, to whom they can submit that complaint, and where the complaint can have a speedy hearing and the evil, if found to exist, can be remedied speedily without the necessity of the complaining party having to go all the way to Washington to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is already greatly overworked.

The commerce clause of the Constitution, consisting of only 16 words, must have been written on rubber, for it has been stretched by judicial and legislative construction to cover everything from a spring branch to a divorce court at Reno. To this may be added the universal challenge, hurled at State commissions by certain class of litigants, "Your act will be confiscatory under the fourteenth amendment." These two constitutional bugbears have challenged the rights of sovereign States in season and out of season; but I am glad to say that the pendulum is swinging back, that the highest courts of the land recognize the rights of the States, and that the days of centralized buccaneering, like all other evils that escaped from Pandora's box, are being wiped out by a stronger and a broader view of national problems which must obtain; and the constitutional balance is poised in the hollow of the hand of the greatest judicial tribunal in the world, the Supreme Court of the United States, which is at last the bulwark of defense of a free people.

While the Constitution of the United States was intended by its wise framers to be adjustable to new and unseen conditions which might arise in the future years after its adoption, still, with all of their wisdom, they were not capable of foreseeing many things which have taken place in the evolution of our civilization since they drafted that historical document. Since the memorable sessions which led to the adoption of our Constitution our civilization has seen the advent of steam railroads, electric railways, pipe lines for conveying natural gas over the country, electric transmission lines, telephone and telegraph lines threading the country like a net, motor vehicles carrying freight and passengers across State lines, and finally have come down to the common use of the aeroplane and radio. When the provision was inserted in our Constitution to the effect that Congress should have the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and among the Indian tribes," even the most vivid imagination could not have anticipated the remarkable growth and development in our civilization which has taken place; but notwithstanding this fact, the Constitution must still stand as the fundamental law of the land.

When courts are dealing with statutory law involving solely disputes between individual litigants certain time-honored rules must be applied by the courts without regard to the personality of the judge. However, constitutional law is a matter of government and politics, which involves the relation between the individual and the State and between the State and the Nation. The Constitution is, therefore, in truth what the judges say it is, and different judges have said and are saying different things at different times. As said by Mr. Pollard in a recent article in one of the leading magazines of the country:

"Their interpretation depends upon the forces at work molding public opinion outside the court room, upon their own private economic and political predilections, their conscious or subconscious slants for or against property, and many other subtle and intangible factors. Despite the old maxim to the contrary, it is becoming increasingly apparent that ours is a government more of men than of laws."

Only a few years ago it was very frequent that Justices Holmes and Brandeis dissented in cases involving constitutional interpretation. Later, upon Justice Stone coming to the bench, his name was frequently added to the dissent. The personnel of the court was further changed by the appointment of Chief Justice Hughes and Justice Roberts to the bench. Since their coming to this court the decisions of the court have become more liberal. One of the first cases indicating this trend was a case from New Jersey involving the validity of a statute limiting the rate of commission to be charged by agents for insurance companies. The new court upheld the act as valid on the theory that the insurance agent was an integral part of the business "clothed with a public interest." The court has likewise upheld an Indiana statute taxing chain stores. It has also upheld an Ohio statute imposing a tax on natural gas brought into Ohio from another State as a valid exercise of the taxing power of the State of Ohio. In fact, an examination of the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States will show a growing and fixed tendency on the part of that court to recognize the rights of the States and their power and authority to regulate and control to a certain extent agencies engaged in interstate commerce. In this connection, while the members of our judiciary may not be influenced to any great extent by public opinion and should not be influenced by unthinking mob clamor, I think it is well for our State commissions to keep up their fight for State rights, to the end that good sound public opinion may more completely and thoroughly recognize those rights and the courts of the country also recognize them in their interpretation of our fundamental law.

In conclusion let me say that I would not attempt to offer a policy for the future guidance of our great organization, for I shall be followed in this exalted office by a distinguished commissioner, far more able than I, who will take the wheel of the ship. I can only conclude by saying that my services, whatever they may be worth, will be freely given, and I shall follow the leadership of him who may be called to this exalted position.

I could not conclude this address without expressing my very deep appreciation and esteem for the man who is more responsible, probably, than any other for making these conventions and the general work of the association a success, our beloved secretary, Hon. James B. Walker.

It is needless for me to say that both the association and I feel that to leave our beloved general solicitor, Hon. John E. Benton, and our assistant general solicitor, Hon. Clyde Bailey, unmentioned would be like the play of Hamlet with Hamlet left out. To both of them I express my deepest and sincerest affection.

And you whose associations and friendships, now covering almost a quarter of a century, have made this great organization possible, will be to me in the afterglow the happiest memories of my life. Being an optimist by nature and standing here upon the sacred soil of old Virginia, the very cradle of our liberty and our civilization, I believe that our country will emerge from the fogs of depression stronger and better, and, in the providence of God, will continue to be the leader of the world.

THE WORLD COURT

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have been requested to have an article from the Philadelphia Public Ledger presented for the benefit of the Senate. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Public Ledger of December 1, 1931]

PHYSICIAN BACKS TRIBUNAL FOR ITS AID IN HALTING WAR—FINDS GROUP'S WORK FOR PEACEFUL SETTLEMENTS COMPATIBLE WITH SCIENCE'S AIM TO PRESERVE HUMAN LIVES

By Truman G. Schnabel, M. D., graduate school of medicine, University of Pennsylvania

About the year 1913, when certain statesmen and economists were advancing the thesis that a large-scale war was becoming virtually an impossibility, chemists were silently noting the final success of Haber's nitrogen-fixation process, realizing, as most of the world did not, the true significance of the fact that it would no longer be necessary to depend upon saltpeter.

Certainly science made the last war what it was. But scientists as a whole, trying as they are impersonally to catch a fragment of the truth of the processes of nature, animate and inanimate, are not, I think, nevertheless, cheered by the application of their discoveries to the processes of destruction.

Those scientists, for instance, that had been working on the fixation of nitrogen with a view to its use for fertilizing and thus for increasing and improving the food supply of the world, can hardly have been greatly pleased when they see their idea converted to the manufacture of munitions for the destruction of human life.

AGREES WITH EINSTEIN

Without going all the way with Einstein when he calls upon the scientists of the world to join him in utter resistance to war, we must admit that he is right in implying that the basic scientific ideal of conserving life is violated by what he calls "the technical development which produces the means for the destruction of human life and of the dearly created products of human labor."

Those who look upon war as a salutary agent for reducing excess population and "purifying the race" have to slide over the fact that it is the fittest that war removes.

Science—medical science at least—is interested in preserving life and making it more livable. That, I think, is the ideal that has sustained those that have risked, and given, life itself in the study of X rays and radium, arsenic and cyanogen, yellow fever and malaria. They are sustained, I am sure, by the idea of developing a race which, although certainly not utterly perfectible, is capable of progressive gain in enjoyment of health, of labor, of living.

A PHYSICIAN'S VIEW

Medical men, pledged as they are to the conservation of human life, to the endless battle against disease, and to the struggle to cure it after it occurs and to prevent its occurrence, can hardly fit into their scheme and purpose the idea of war that kills and starves and mutilates.

Most of the medical men that went abroad during the war and also those who stayed at home and dealt, as we are still dealing, with the tragic results of the war among our enlisted men have developed more or less conscious conclusions about the effect of war on the development of the race. It is true that a doctor may have rejoiced professionally in the stimulus given to medical science by the war emergency in the development of more effective agents for preventing infection, in the advances made in plastic surgery, etc.

But this professional satisfaction will certainly not blot out his deeper realization of the horror and absurdity of deliberately continuing to use a process that will inevitably produce as a matter of course all that infection, all those faces half shot away, all those limbless torsoes.

NEED TO LIVE STRESSED

Let me make one point clear: It is the waste of war that the average man with scientific training would object to, the lack of logic in this method of settling international differences.

Perhaps we could define the scientist's attitude toward life as being an interest in ascertaining the law of life in the hope that it may be applied to life by those responsible for the conduct of affairs. The average scientist is not a pacifist; he spends his life observing the endless conflict of one organism with another. And it is not that he fears danger; a biologist, for example, lives and moves and has his being in a world of germs so deadly that bullets seem like snowflakes by comparison.

But, he feels, since there are so many other battles in other fields to be fought and won, so many things to be found out before we even begin to know how to live, why not at least transfer from the military to the judicial field such disputes as can be so settled?

FINDS TREATISE NEEDED

A good many treatises have been written outlining the results of the war on economic conditions and on financial stability throughout the world. Most of us have a more or less direct personal realization of the latter. It would probably be difficult, indeed, to survey in the same way the effect of the war on the physical fitness of the race, but if such a treatise could be scientifically and sanely produced, the result would be illuminating.

The whole country was shocked in 1917–18 by what the draft revealed—the tremendous number of our younger men supposedly "normal," but really gravely unfit, not merely for the trenches but also for the day's work in the mills, on the docks, in the office.

Shocked realization that we were not bringing along a more physically competent race might explain such reactions to the situation as that of the American Medical Association, when in 1929 it indorsed by resolution the national defense act, with its training camps, etc., aiming at greater physical fitness for the men of the Nation, or for a part of them.

CALLS FOR RATIFICATION

But this care for the fitness of the race in terms of preparedness is not sufficiently comprehensive and not scientifically satisfying. We want human life conserved and made more competent not merely so that we shall hold our own more satisfactorily if we are forced into war but also—and chiefly—for the pursuits of peace.

Those who see the conservation of life in this light will certainly seek every practicable means for preventing war. Among them the World Court seems to me a notable experiment. Mr. Roland Morris pointed out in these columns a few days ago how difficult and dangerous were some of the 36 questions dealt with by the court during the 10 years of its existence.

The fact that the court does not pretend to be able in all circumstances to maintain the peace of the world, that its field is sharply limited, that it undertakes to settle only questions of a legal nature when both parties to the dispute consent to submitting them makes me regard it as an experiment conceived upon sound lines.

Its actual record to date makes me regard it further as an experiment already entitled to the respect of the world and as justifying a great hope for its future. I hope the Senate coming together next week will promptly ratify the three treaties that will complete the adherence of the United States.

"THE RESTORATION OF SILVER"—ADDRESS BY SENATOR ODDIE

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an article by the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] entitled "The Restoration of Silver," which appeared in the December issue of the Mining Congress Journal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

THE RESTORATION OF SILVER

By TASKER L. ODDIE, United States Senator from Nevada

Because of the importance of silver in the world's monetary system for over 2,000 years and the difficulty which is now being experienced in attempting to impose on gold practically the entire monetary and credit burdens of the world, silver is now being more widely discussed than ever before. When Great Britain, the ruling creditor nation for 100 years following the Napoleonic wars, after a most courageous fight found it impossible to maintain the gold standard, there is no question but that the monetary and credit burdens on gold have become greatly increased in recent years.

GOLD OVERBURDENED

As silver coinage was debased by most of the principal gold-standard countries following the World War and as India was compelled to sell silver from her extensive reserves in order to acquire the gold to maintain the high 18d. parity of the rupee, the price of silver declined to the lowest levels in history and its monetary status has become seriously impaired. With the diminishing monetary demand for silver came the ever-increasing demand for gold to carry the entire monetary and credit burdens of the world, and this constitutes an important factor in the present economic depression.

The currency policy of India since 1926, when the gold-bullion standard was adopted, has operated greatly to reduce the price of silver, thereby lessening its monetary value and use. It should be emphasized that gold going into India rapidly becomes hoarded and withdrawn from monetary use, which complicates the distribution of gold. Furthermore, the withdrawal of gold from the limited available monetary reserves of the world has automatically increased the burden for them to carry. Because of this fact extensive withdrawals of gold by India since 1926 have seriously lessened the available monetary gold reserves of the world and thereby limited the amount of credit which could have been issued for the purpose of maintaining the world's normal industry and trade.

Notwithstanding the imposition of the gold-bullion standard on India, the appetite of the people for silver has not abated, as is evidenced by the large amount of silver imported since 1926 into that country.

Political chaos and the subnormal state of China's industry and trade and internal warfare have seriously weakened her position in the silver market. This summer I visited China in order to study her economic and currency problems first-hand. I found in that country that the future of silver was one of the most discussed subjects. She is still on a silver basis, and her prosperity depends more on the rehabilitation and stabilization of silver at a much higher price than that now existing than upon anything else. A restoration of political order and the cessation of internal strife would greatly assist in improving her industrial conditions, and the return of silver to its more normal monetary status preceding the World War would be reflected in a large increase in her foreign trade. A peaceful China with a well-ordered government would in itself be of most effective assistance in improving the position of silver, upon which the return to normal world economic conditions so greatly depends.

MEXICO RETURNS TO SILVER

The recent return of Mexico to the silver basis should strengthen the position of silver, especially if Mexico would remint her silver coinage on the high fineness of the old "peso fuerte." Unless this is done the inflation in wages and in the prices of supplies in Mexico which will probably occur on the present debased minting fineness of current coinage will minimize, if not altogether destroy, the benefits which otherwise might be expected from the adoption of the silver standard.

RESTORATION OF PRE-WAR STATUS

The desirability of reestablishing the pre-war status of silver and the ways and means for its accomplishment in the most expeditious manner were pointed out by Mr. Francis H. Brownell, chairman of the board of the American Smelting and Refining Co., in an address delivered before the American Bar Association on September 16, 1931, from which I quote the following:

"There seems to be no way yet discovered of curing the growing maldistribution of gold among the nations, possibly because there is not even to-day a sufficient amount of gold to do the money work required of it. With nearly all the nations of South and Central America in a state of political instability because of monetary troubles and with the increasing difficulty in maintaining an adequate gold reserve in Germany and in central Europe, Austria, Hungary, Poland, and many other nations—even Australia and, most striking of all, Great Britain herself—it would seem wise and for the best interest of the entire world not only to stop the further destruction of the value of the only other metal which mankind has yet used as money—silver—but to go a step farther and restore the value of silver to the extent, at least, that it enjoyed in the days before the World War, thus affording a currency in which people can have confidence because it would have intrinsic value in itself and relieving the growing burden on gold.

"It requires no great study of ways and means to preserve and restore the value of silver to its pre-war status. All that is necessary is that the nations of the world retrace the steps taken since the war; that they stop any further demonetization of silver now in use; that they individually or collectively, or both, make it known that the further sale of silver by governments will cease; that the governments, while not establishing any fixed ratio between gold and silver, make clear their intention to resume the use of silver to the same extent as before the World War. This automatically would restore silver to pre-war values. It automatically would preserve it for present and future monetary needs of the world. It would lessen the present burden on gold. The step is easily taken, if the will to take it exists. It needs only cooperative action by the more important industrial nations of the world. Formal action in the shape of treaties is not required. If the British Empire, France, Germany, Italy, the United States, and Japan should substantially simultaneously recommend the adoption of such a policy and should individually announce their intention so to act, the smaller nations of the world, seeing that silver is not doomed to abandonment as money but is to be continued in use, would rapidly adopt a similar policy. An international conference, formal or informal in its nature, recommending such action, would be of the greatest help. The rapid restoration of the value of silver that would necessarily follow would effect immediate improvement of the present financial condition of so many nations in Europe, Asia, South and Central America, including Mexico, that the whole world would rapidly respond to the beneficial effect.

"No one could reasonably maintain the actions above described would alone terminate the present world depression, the greatest and most far-reaching in history. There are many other important problems, such as the steady and rapid increase of high tariffs among nations, with consequent reduction of international trade, not to mention others under general discussion. None the less, sound and stable monetary systems are of paramount and fundamental importance in all nations.

"Not until the staggering, weakening, almost failing monetary systems of a great majority of the nations of the world to-day are again restored to a proper basis may we expect a full return of the prosperity formerly enjoyed. Is there any quicker or more efficacious way of establishing confidence in the various moneys of the nations than by restoring the monetary use of silver, as before the war, thus affording to the common people of all those countries a medium of saving in which they may have confidence and a medium of exchange which will have sufficient intrinsic value in itself to supplement and support an overworked and overburdened gold reserve? Such action does not weaken nor tend to destroy any gold-standard system; rather it gives aid and support where it is now so sorely needed."

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE NECESSARY

The Mining Journal of London on September 26, 1931, published an editorial entitled "The Abandonment of the Gold Standard," from which the following references in connection with silver are quoted:

"Another and very interesting reaction of our abandonment of the gold standard suggests itself in connection with silver. At an important meeting convened by the China Association this week in the city, the resolution was taken to establish a silver association to impress upon governments the desirability of restoring the position of silver as a monetary and exchange factor. We have on many occasions urged the importance of a sympathetic study of the question, believing that as regards eastern trade, at any rate, appreciable advance might be made to assist the buying power of our lost markets in these areas, besides easing the strain on the world's greatly diminished supplies of free gold. As we are no longer on a gold standard, financial orthodoxy can no longer be advanced as a reason for refusing to discuss the question, and it is at any rate arguable that some reliance on silver might offer greater security against currency fluctuations than one based entirely upon the paper pound. Considering the forum in which the question was discussed on Wednesday last, the survey of the subject was largely confined to India and China, which are naturally silver-using countries.

"The suggestions put forward at the meeting followed lines very familiar to our readers from contributions which have appeared in the columns of the Mining Journal. We do not suppose that there is any section of financial or industrial thought which would not welcome an improvement in the price of silver, provided this were not brought about by artificial means which would involve disproportionate sacrifices in other directions. The anomalies of the Indian government policy have often been referred to in these pages, and it is clear that there is a growing volume of opinion in India which is highly dissatisfied with the recent course of events. This week the viceroy thought it necessary to veto the discussion of the recent financial statement of government, including the announcement that the rupee would in future be linked with sterling. While any premature discussion of such an intricate question is to be deprecated, it is obvious, particularly with the round-table conference now assembled in London, that it will be impossible not to defer ultimately to Indian opinion in a matter of this kind should there be widespread demand for a consideration of the position in relation to silver. As Mr. Brownell has pointed out, it is the policy of the Indian government, threatening at any time to throw, without notice, large quantities of silver on a depreciated market, which has done much to destroy confidence in the value of the white metal, and there would seem to be quite an important field in which constructive cooperation could be effected to improve silver prices without committing us to the more ambitious projects commonly associated with what is known as bimetallism."

This editorial presents a very sympathetic understanding of the subject, and, having its origin in Great Britain, is a most hopeful sign that something might now be done in an international conference to improve the silver situation, which is fundamental to the restoration of prosperity.

OUTLOOK FAVORABLE

Improvement in the general economic condition of the world has already resulted from President Hoover's constructive action in declaring a foreign debt moratorium for one year. While this action was principally beneficial in alleviating international financial strain, the second step taken by him in creating a supercredit bank for the purpose of lessening the credit strain within the United States has already been and will continue to be a most helpful factor in overcoming the difficulties of the present depression.

The more recent conference between President Hoover and Mr. Laval, the president of the Council of Ministers of France, should go still farther in rectifying the present disturbed monetary and economic conditions. A joint statement signed by both, dated October 25, 1931, contains the following reference to the maintenance of the gold standard and the stabilization of international exchanges:

"Our especial emphasis has been upon the more important means through which the efforts of our Governments could be exerted toward restoration of economic stability and confidence.

"Particularly we are convinced of the importance of monetary stability as an essential factor in the restoration of normal economic life in the world in which the maintenance of the gold standard in France and in the United States will serve as a major influence.

"It is our intent to continue to study methods for the maintenance of stability in international exchanges."

THE FOURTH CONSTRUCTIVE STEP

The fourth constructive step in maintaining the gold standard and in aiding those countries which are not on a gold basis to rapidly return to it would be the convening of an international conference to discuss ways and means for the restoration of silver to its pre-war status, when it carried a very substantial burden of the world's finance. Many proposals have been made for bettering the situation and these should be referred to an international conference for study and investigation. The President has full authority under a resolution passed by the Senate in the third session of the Seventy-first Congress to call such a conference. Action along this line should now meet with the hearty approval of Great Britain and a number of other nations which have recently gone off the gold standard. No more constructive step could be taken at this time to restore the gold standard as the almost universal monetary system which it was before the World War began and to expedite the return to more normal economic conditions throughout the world.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I understand unanimous consent is asked for the immediate consideration of the resolution. I am not going to object, but I do wish to say that I think it is a very great mistake to increase the membership of our committees as it is now proposed to increase them. When we adopted our rules several years ago we put the limit on the membership of the committees very much lower even than it is now. We thought the committees were too large. We have increased them slightly since. The pending resolution proposes a much greater increase.

As I have said, I am not going to object but am simply going to express my own judgment that it is a very great mistake on our part to enlarge the committees as now proposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to consideration of the resolution proposed by the Senator from Oregon?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. From the committee on committees I report an order providing for the Republican membership of the committees, including the chairmen, and ask unanimous consent that it may be acted upon by viva voce vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in the same connection I ask leave to report for the minority of the membership of the minority on the various committees referred to in the rule. I ask that list reported by me may be considered in connection with the list reported by the Senator from Oregon for the majority.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The names of the chairman and members of each committee as proposed in the order submitted by Mr. McNARY, with the additions proposed by Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, were severally read and severally agreed to, as follows:

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Whereas the wholesale prices of building materials have declined from an index of 82.9 in January, 1931, to 74.9 in September, 1931; and

Whereas the amount of money spent for relief in the larger American cities, as reported by the Russell Sage Foundation of New York, was in September, 1931, 142 per cent greater than in September, 1930, and in October, 1931, 113 per cent greater than in October, 1930; and

Whereas all of the available economic data give evidence of the fact that there has been a continuous and substantial increase of the number of persons unable to secure employment and of the number of families whose resources have been exhausted and who are, therefore, dependent upon the help of public and private agencies for the means of existence; and

Whereas the Federal Government is, for reasons which spring from the very purpose of its organization, charged with the duty of providing for the general welfare of the United States and must, therefore, exert its full powers to promote the improvement of business conditions and alleviate suffering; and

Whereas it is in the public interest and in furtherance of public morale wherever possible to provide work rather than charity for those in need of employment; and

Whereas it is in consonance with the dictates of sound and prudent economy to utilize the idle time of those who are willing and ready to work in the construction of such public works and the prosecution of such public projects as will contribute to the permanent wealth and progress of this Nation; and

Whereas the prompt and vigorous prosecution of an extensive public-works program in an amount of $2,000,000,000 would not only provide useful employment to many hundred thousands of workers now unwillingly idle but would, in addition, stimulate private trade, revitalize private industry, and put into circulation a stream of purchasing power which would bring new life to every branch of the economic efforts of the American people, agricultural as well as industrial; and

Whereas it is both feasible and sound by financing the cost thereof through long-term bonds to conduct such a public-works program without adding to the immediate tax burden; and

Whereas Congress has made provision for such a situation by the enactment of the employment stabilization act of 1931, intending thereby that "during periods of business depression" the power of the Federal Government shall be exercised through its construction agencies "to aid in preventing unemployment" and to relieve the hardships and rigors which it imposes: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President, the Federal Employment Stabilization Board, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, and the construction agencies as defined in the Federal employment stabilization act (46 Stat. 1084) are severally requested to exercise the authority conferred upon them by said act to the end that supplemental estimates of public-works emergency appropriations in an amount of $2,000,000,000 may at the earliest possible time be transmitted to Congress pursuant to such act, so that an emergency public-works program may be inaugurated and the policy of Congress declared in such act may be effectuated.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution may lie upon the table, to be called up at a later date.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution will lie on the table.

The number and names of the corporations carrying ocean mail for the Government under such contracts, whether the said companies are organized under a State or National law or organized under the laws of foreign countries. If such companies, or any of the same, are owned or controlled by aliens or by foreign steamship companies, or other holding companies, then give the names of such owning, holding, or controlling company, with the names of the board of directors of each contracting company and of each holding, controlling, and operating company.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF BILLS

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on the 9th instant I submitted a bill (S. 10) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to designate an officer to represent the District government on the floor of the Senate and House of Representatives, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I have discovered that perhaps it should have gone to the Committee on Rules. I therefore ask that the Committee on the District of Columbia be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution and that it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 418) to extend the admiralty laws of the United States of America to the Virgin Islands, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, be rereferred to the Committee on Commerce. It concerns the admiralty law, and should go to that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DEDICATION OF COLONIAL NATIONAL MONUMENT (S. DOC. NO. 19)

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur, Secretary of the Interior, delivered a very interesting address at Yorktown, Va., on October 16, 1931, upon the occasion of the dedication of the Colonial National Monument. I ask that the address may be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROPOSED MONETARY CONFERENCE

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate on a bill I have just introduced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator from Washington addressing the Senate? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Washington will proceed.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has to-day introduced a bill which proposes to place silver on a monetary basis to the extent of allowing one kind of debtors of this Government to pay their debts in silver. I rise to discuss the proposal for a few moments, and also a proposal which I have made in the form of the bill which I have introduced myself.

It seems to me that the proposal of the Senator from Utah is not fair to the interests of this country. It is not just, because it is a one-sided bargain. Either all debtors should be allowed to use silver in payment of their debts, or none should be allowed to do so.

Any such plan as is suggested by the Senator from Utah would inevitably result in the dumping of large quantities of silver from our debtor nations into this country.

Last summer we were told that the reason why the President would not call the international conference on the silver question requested by the Senate resolution agreed to at the last session of Congress was that England was not willing to enter such a conference. To-day England and other countries owing this Government are desirous of having their debts revised. They are coming to this Government for a favor, and it would seem that if they want a favor they should be willing to enter a conference and consider things which might be a favor to this country and result, as I believe, in great benefits to the world.

If this Government is to accept silver in payment of debts owing it, there is but one fair and sensible and economic thing to do, and that is to make silver a basis for money, give it a monetary value, establish it as a medium of world exchange, and let it be used as a basis for the payment of public and private debts, whether between governments or between individuals.

For the reasons I have stated, namely, that the countries of Europe which owe us money are desirous now of bargaining with us as to the payment of their debts, it seems appropriate that we should propose an international conference for the purpose of working out a basis for the use of silver as money, and when such proposals have been agreed upon and ratified by the governments concerned, we may then authorize the President to accept silver or gold in payment of these debts, but not until that is done.

I have therefore introduced a bill proposing that a monetary conference committee be appointed, with a membership of 9, 3 of them to be chosen by the President, 3 from the Senate by the Vice President, and 3 from the House of Representatives by the Speaker of the House, and that that committee be authorized to meet with the representatives of other governments which this Government may invite for the purpose of agreeing upon silver as a monetary basis and a basis for world exchange; and that if such proposals are made and ratified, then it will be lawful for the President to provide that these annual payments may be made in silver so long as those countries continue to retain silver as a standard of value for money.

Mr. President, I can not refrain from saying a few words about the developments since Congress met, in connection with the foreign-debt proposal.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer a question before he enters upon the discussion of that feature?

Mr. DILL. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. These several nations agreed to pay us certain sums of money at certain times. Did they not agree to pay us in gold?

Mr. DILL. They did.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Why do they not do it?

Mr. DILL. I think primarily because they have not the gold, and they can not get the gold; and the fact that they can not get the gold is the best reason on earth why we and they should be willing to enlarge the basis of currency throughout the world.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. We have bonds outstanding payable in gold, have we not?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does the Senator know of any way by which our Government can be relieved from meeting those obligations by payment in gold?

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, that is another question, which I do not think I shall undertake to discuss at this time, because that relates to the redemption of our own bonds by payments from our own Treasury, and while it might be considered somewhat connected I do not think it necessarily is involved in this discussion, and I would rather not be led into such discussion, because I do not want to speak at any length upon this subject to-day. At a later date I shall hope to discuss this whole question in greater detail and in connection with the many ramifications it involves.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. KING. I did not quite understand from the Senator the function which the President is to perform in connection with this monetary conference. Is it left to his discretion as to whether he will invite nations? If that is true, I suggest that the Senator amend his bill to compel the President by the act to invite nations.

Mr. DILL. I did not place a mandatory provision in the bill. It seemed to me that if the bill were passed or if a bill of this kind were passed by both Houses of Congress and the President signed it, that would be sufficient. If the President gave his assent to it as a law, for I propose it as a law, that would be sufficient. However, that is a matter which could be considered by the committee.

I was about to say when I was interrupted that the President proposed in his message to Congress on this subject a revival of the World War Foreign Debt Commission. Not within my knowledge—and I doubt if in recent history—has any proposal by a President on an international subject been turned down so completely and so overwhelmingly in so short a time by members of both parties in Congress as was his proposal. Within 48 hours it became evident that there was not a chance for such a bill to be passed. In the words of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I believe it was, it was "as dead as Julius Cæsar."

Then the Secretary of the Treasury attempted to resurrect the dead proposal. In his explanation of what the President meant he said that the administration is opposed to cancellation. He proceeded to explain what the President meant, and as I read it I was impressed that it was in reality a proposal to balance the British budget. He gave as a basis for his argument the fact that owing to the depreciation of the value of the English pound it would be necessary, if we held to the present annual payment, for England to increase almost 50 per cent the number of pounds to be paid to the United States, and that in the interest of the British budget, in effect, we should cut down the annual payment to an amount that would cause England to be required to pay no greater number of pounds, inflated though they may be, in paying her debt to this country.

But the Secretary of the Treasury, this man who had been compared to Alexander Hamilton before the hard times came upon us, this man whom some one has described in a book as "the man who stayed too long," would have the Congress and the American people believe that this is not cancellation. I do not know whether the Secretary of the Treasury considers the Members of Congress and the people a "bunch of boobs" or whether he was trying to draw a red herring across the trail of thought so strong against cancellation. If that principle is to be recognized it is an invitation to every government that owes the United States to inflate its currency, because every time it might inflate its currency, every time it might cheapen its money, we would revise our agreement with it so it will not need to pay any more than the same number of pounds or francs or whatever its money may be. That proposal died, I think, almost before it was born, because it was worse than an outright proposal of cancellation.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] now comes forward with a plan that is still one-sided, but it does have the merit of calling attention to the fact that silver might very properly be used in the payment of international obligations. However, it still has the fatal weakness that the President's plan has, that Mr. Mellon's explanation has, namely, that it will benefit nobody except the countries who are to be relieved of their debts to the extent that they would be relieved by this proposed method. It is about time that somebody proposed something in relation to this matter that will benefit the rest of the world and particularly the United States. I suggest an international conference to be called now, that will establish silver as one of the bases of money in the world, as a basis for world exchange. This would not only benefit the debtor nations of the United States but will benefit the people of the United States and the rest of the world. God knows there is need of some such proposition being adopted by the nations of the world.

The senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] a few days ago in a masterful address showed quite conclusively the advantages of using silver as a basis of money throughout the world. I shall not attempt at this time to repeat or enlarge upon what he said, but I do want to call attention to the great need of money throughout the world for world trade. A year or so ago, when Soviet Russia was reported to be exchanging goods with other countries for other goods, newspaper and magazine editors, economists, and Government officials of this country pointed to it as an example of the failure of the Soviet Government. They said it proved the inability of the Soviet Government to meet the needs of modern civilization and modern trade. Yet within a few months afterwards we saw our own Farm Board, an arm of our Government, trading and bartering our wheat for Brazilian coffee.

I noted yesterday a newspaper article by Carl Duisberg, known as the Rockefeller of Germany, which opened with the statement that the nations of the world are now bartering like the Negro tribes of Africa. While that is probably an exaggerated statement, it does call attention to the fact that we are no longer using money for trade as we did in the past, but we are resorting to barter. Within our own borders we have seen the bartering system carried out in a remarkable manner. Out in the wheat country, where they produced vast quantities of wheat last year, we saw advertisements in the newspapers where theater managers were offering to give the people a theater ticket or two theater tickets for a bushel of wheat. We saw great furniture stores advertising chairs and settees and various pieces of dining-room furniture for so many bushels of wheat. We saw certain quantities of groceries offered for so many bushels of wheat; a pair of shoes for so many bushels of wheat; and a suit of clothes for so many bushels of wheat. I heard only the other day that the State Fair Association of Indiana, from which State hails our beloved colleague the leader on the Republican side [Mr. WATSON], charged a bushel of wheat as an admission to the State fair this year.

I mention these things simply to call attention to the fact that there is need of an enlargement of our currency system in order to provide a broader basis for the money of this country and of the world. Unless we do establish a broader base for the currency of this land and of the world, then we can only go on enlarging the great credit structure upon the ever-narrowing base of gold. The only proposal we have before us along that line is one coming from the President, and is that we shall take the taxpayers' money and shall loan it upon securities upon which good bankers and private investors will not loan money to-day, or, what is worse, take up the frozen securities of banks that have defaulted because the loans were not such as could be liquefied, and doubtless in these times could not be made to pay even the value of the amount of the loan.

I shall not enlarge upon the subject at this time; but I did want, in the light of discussions going on in newspapers and proposals being made, all of them in the interest of foreign governments alone, to offer something that it seemed to me would give this Government a chance to bargain a little bit and get something on its side of the ledger in dealing with these foreign debts. When we had the former debt revision commission we got nothing except cancellation of practically two-thirds of our foreign indebtedness. I think that fact more than any other is the reason why the Members of Congress and the American people immediately turned against the proposal to revive the World War Foreign Debt Commission. They have been taught by bitter experience with the last one that when we deal with the word "revision" in connection with foreign debts it means cancellation. Congress has consented to all of the cancellation that they believe should be consented to. If the foreign countries can not pay their debts, then let them come forward frankly and say so, and let them delay or repudiate as best they may; but let us not be guilty by our own action of giving them credits upon which to continue building up their vast armaments and, worst of all, after getting ready for another war, have credits upon which they can borrow funds throughout the world as a result of the cancellation of their just debts which we have granted.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Charles G. Ross which appeared in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch on November 29, 1931. There are conclusions in the article with which I can not agree, but it is a very comprehensive discussion of the economic situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Sunday morning, November 29, 1931]

THE COUNTRY'S PLIGHT—WHAT CAN BE DONE ABOUT IT?—PRESENT-DAY DISTRIBUTION OF WEALTH FOUND TO BE THE ROOT CAUSE OF BOTH "OVERPRODUCTION" AND UNEMPLOYMENT—AN EXPOSITION OF WHAT PRESIDENT HOOVER HAS CHARACTERIZED AS "THE GREATEST CRISIS THE WORLD HAS EVER KNOWN"—THE SIGNIFICANT FACTS UNDERLYING THE NATIONAL PREDICAMENT WHICH WILL BE PRESENTED TO THE COMING CONGRESS

By Charles G. Ross, chief Washington correspondent of the Post-Dispatch

I.—Hard times have produced hard thinking—The capitalistic system of government is on trial

WASHINGTON, November, 1931.—To a greater extent than ever before in this generation the people of the United States are thinking in realistic terms. The old slogans by which the thought—or the emotion—of the country was guided in the Coolidge era have been examined and found to be but a form of words. The mood in which the country accepted as inspired doctrine the prophecies of "a chicken in every pot" and "a job for every man" has changed into one of doubt and questioning. Now that "this, the greatest crisis the world has ever known," as President Hoover called it in his Indianapolis speech last summer, has run into its third year, the voices of even the most confident believers in the early return of prosperity are pitched in a lower key.

Too much gilt has been rubbed off the forecasts of the past for any political or industrial seer to tell us in the present state of things that "prosperity lies just around the corner." We have begun to see, as the wise Mr. Justice Holmes said in another connection, that "certitude is not the test of certainty." We know now that "we have been cocksure of many things that were not so."

CHALLENGE TO BE MET

Events have forced us to consider the facts. Phrases do not feed the hungry, or give jobs to the six or seven million who want work and can not find it. The jobless man can derive no comfort from the proclamation that we are merely in one of those "cyclical" depressions which are bound to come every so often and, having passed, leave us better off than before. Hard times have produced hard thinking. In one line, at least, underconsumption is not to be deplored. We are consuming less and less of the buncombe engendered in the lush days of our prosperity—and in this fact lies some measure of compensation for the plight into which we have got ourselves.

One need not go into the field of radical writing to find vigorous expression of the view that the capitalistic system is on trial. In growing numbers, highly placed defenders of capitalism, men who have prospered under it and who desire its basic features preserved, are saying that if capitalism is successfully to meet the challenge of other forms of social organization, it must clean house.

Not Norman Thomas, the Socialist leader, but Daniel Willard, the president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, told the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce last spring that a system which permitted five or six million men to be out of work in a country bursting with wealth "can be said to have failed in at least one very important detail." It was Willard, again, and no member of a proscribed order, who said that if he were one of the jobless in those circumstances he would steal before he would starve.

WARNING FROM CAPITALISTS

No upholder of the Marxian philosophy, but Robert S. Brookings, wealthy retired manufacturer, president emeritus of Washington University, of St. Louis, wrote in the Post-Dispatch this year, in advocating a modified form of capitalism, that "our western civilization must vindicate its worth if it is to endure." And he added that it could vindicate its worth "only by demonstrating its ability to correct its own defects and its consequent capacity for constructive development."

Prof. F. W. Taussig, of Harvard, sees "control and power concentrated in a few hands to an ominous degree," and Henry W. Anderson, conservative Virginia lawyer and a member of the Wickersham Commission, finds in his recent survey of the causes of crime that the American people, as an incident to the exploitation for private gain of one of the most fruitful areas of the world, have "created the widest spread between the extremes of wealth and poverty existing in the western world."

Senator JAMES COUZENS, of Michigan, who helped to create the Ford Motor Co. and made a fortune out of it, sounds the warning that "people will not suffer indefinitely in the midst of plenty," and Dr. L. D. Coffman, president of the University of Minnesota, declares that "communism in its various forms will not be held at bay by negative actions."

MORE THAN A "DEPRESSION"

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, asserts that we are passing through no ordinary depression but through a revolutionary period brought on by long-accumulating forces. What the country needs, he says, is "personalities who are not anxious, like the jockey, to keep their seats in politics but who are willing to tell the people the truth and to guide them toward a constructive, a liberal, and a progressive solution of these vast problems."

Dean Wallace B. Donham, of the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration, author of Business Adrift, said to the recent meeting of the International Chamber of Commerce in Washington that if there were not sufficient brains and good will in the world to solve the problems of the depression, "then our mass production, our scientific progress, our control over nature may actually destroy civilization."

Quotations of this sort might be multiplied. They are appearing in our newspapers and magazines almost daily. They represent the views not of revolutionists who would destroy capitalism but of thoughtful men who believe in capitalism and would save it from its own excesses.

II.—We must know the facts if we are to deal intelligently with the depression

It is the purpose of this article to set out, as simply as may be, the elements—the A, B, C—of the plight in which the country finds itself. Diagnosis is the chief aim, not prescription. One of the writers already quoted, Professor Taussig, says that we have made hardly any progress toward obviating or even minimizing the curse of unemployment; that with respect to prevention or remedy we are all very much in the dark. Decrying the assumption that "one simple panacea" will bring back prosperity, he pleads "for moderation and good sense, for cessation of sham talk about sham remedies, for an earnest facing of the really great, really ominous problems."

That is, if we are to get anywhere at all toward the solution of our problems, we must know the root facts out of which they spring. Such is the confusion of counsel from various sources that it is no wonder the people are at times bemused. What are we to believe when the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and Gerard Swope, the president of the General Electric Co., present to us hopefully plans for the "stabilization" of industry, while, on the equally authoritative other hand, Albert H. Wiggin, the chairman of the board of the Chase National Bank, informs a Senate committee that "no commission or any brain in the world" will avail to prevent future depressions?

STATING THE REAL ISSUES

What are we to believe when we find business groups in solemn conclave adopting resolutions against the interference of government in business, and then, the next day, running to the Government for subsidies and subventions? How shall we choose between the mutually destructive theses that we should build up a large foreign trade as a guaranty against unemployment, and that we should take no step to lower our tariff barriers or reduce the war debts?

We must know the facts underlying our depression if we are to form enlightened judgments upon it. Because of the babel of tongues offering remedies, we mistake, too often, the symptom for the disease, and in the clamor for Government action we are prone to forget there are limits beyond which the Government, under the Constitution, can not go. We need to distinguish between the sham remedy, designed to meet the political expediency of the moment, and the remedy that strikes at the root of the disease.

The coming session of Congress will have before it economic issues of transcendent importance. It will be, at the least, a highly interesting session. It may be historic. Only if the citizen has certain essential facts clearly in mind can he follow the unfolding of the drama at Washington with intelligence and understanding.

III.—The distinction between the Government's depression and the general depression—Why the Government is in debt

It is important in our thinking about the American depression to keep clear the distinction between the United States, meaning the whole people thereof, and the Government of the United States. These two entities are often confused; hence, for one reason, the loose assumption that whatever the Government may do to get itself out of its depression will likewise help to get the American people out of their depression.

The problem is not so simple. The Government is a part of the whole. It follows that if the American people, with or without Government aid, regain a measure of prosperity, this prosperity will be reflected in the financial status of the Government; but it does not follow that the curing of the Government's particular depression—its excess of outgo over income—will spell good times for the country.

GOVERNMENT'S PLIGHT SEPARATE

In other words, the American depression presents a duplex problem. The Government is head over heels in debt. It ran a deficit during the last fiscal year of $903,000,000, and the deficit for the current fiscal year, which began last July 1, stood on November 1 at $661,000,000. Private industry and business are likewise in a bad way, and hence the people of the United States, who are dependent upon private industry and business for their wages or dividends, are in a bad way. Each person, therefore, has a dual interest in the depression. He wants his Government to get out of the hole it is in, so that it will stop calling on him (or his children) for increased taxes, and he wants industry and business to get out of their depression, so that his income may be brought back to a satisfactory level.

The Government's depression flows from and is a part of the general depression in the United States. It needs, however, because of the special set of problems involved, to be considered separately.

FROM A FEAST TO A FAMINE

Only 14 years ago we were marveling that the Government had reached a billion-dollar level of receipts and expenditures. To-day by virtue of the normal expansion of Government activities in a fast-growing country and the abnormal expansion caused by the war, it is spending more than $4,000,000,000 a year. Nearly a billion of this goes for military pensions, compensation, etc., and the care of disabled veterans, and more than a billion for interest on and statutory retirement of the war debt. As long as the country remained fairly prosperous it was easy enough to collect the revenues to cover our outlays. It was so easy, in fact, that notwithstanding four successive tax reductions since the war (five if we count the temporary reduction of 1929), the Government had an unbroken series of surpluses from 1920 down to and including the fiscal year 1930.

The change began in the fiscal year 1931, when the effects of the general business depression began to make themselves felt. These effects were double-barreled: They sharply reduced the proceeds from income and miscellaneous taxes and from customs tariffs and they heightened expenditures for relief. In addition, there was a further drying up of nonrecurrent sources of revenues, such as the sale of surplus property and the returns from war-time loans to the railroads—items which, by contributing to the impressive Treasury surpluses of earlier days, had helped to make the fame of Secretary Mellon as "the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton."

EXPENSES KEEP RIGHT ON

Under our present revenue system, the Government depends on corporation and individual income taxes for more than half its receipts. These taxes combined yielded for the fiscal year 1930 $2,410,986,977, and for the following year only $1,860,201,640. The proceeds of miscellaneous internal-revenue taxes (such as the tobacco tax), which form the second largest source of income, dropped from $628,308,035 in 1930 to $567,978,579 in 1931. The total decline in internal-revenue receipts from all sources (income tax and miscellaneous) was about 20 per cent, or $611,965,513. Customs receipts fell from $587,721,925 to $300,856,473.

Now, as we have seen, while the Government's revenues have been thus dwindling as a result of hard times, expenses have piled up on an ascending scale. The interest on the war debt must be paid, and the President has said that the statutory provisions for retirement of the debt should not be disturbed. Pensions and annuities must be paid, loans must be advanced to war veterans on their bonus certificates, hospitals for disabled veterans must be maintained. All these items growing out of wars are first charges against the Government, and there is constant pressure upon Congress from the outside, and upon the President from Congress, to have the benefits to veterans increased.

EVEN A DOLE LOOMS UP

There is a postal deficit to be paid; there is money to be advanced to the States under the Federal road acts; there are Government buildings to be erected under an expanded program; there are rivers and harbors to be improved. In prosperity or depression these expenses go on, and some of them are increased by depression.

The Government is in the same position as a manufacturing plant which has suffered a severe loss of business but has been unable to cut its overhead expenses. In the present fiscal year, moreover, the Government may have to spend large sums—whether as dole or in some other guise—for the relief of distress caused by unemployment. Certainly there will be strong demands in Congress for new relief measures.

The farm problem, notwithstanding the $500,000,000 appropriated by the last Congress for the uses of the Federal Farm Board, remains urgent. And it should be noted, to complete this rough picture of the Government's financial plight, that in this fiscal year, under the Hoover moratorium, it is foregoing the collection of about $260,000,000 due it on the foreign war debt.

IV.—Economy in government is a good thing, but it can't cure the deficit

Economy in government is a good thing, but it can't cure the deficit.

What can the Government do in order to balance its budget? First and obviously, it can economize. In times like these the cry goes up throughout the land, from people and politicians, that the Government should cut expenses. "Economy" is the promise and watchword of every administration; the slogan of every candidate for office. Chambers of commerce demand a "businesslike" pruning of expenditures, and the average citizen is certain that if he were given control there would be wholesale firing of useless Government clerks and a slaughter of boards, bureaus, and commissions. Equally with the alphabet and the multiplication table economy commands the support of us all.

Economy in government is the easiest thing in the world to preach, because all agree upon it in principle, and the hardest thing in the world to practice. Undoubtedly a material saving would be effected by a thorough overhauling and reorganization of the Government departments. As everybody knows, the present set-up is illogical in many respects and is filled with duplication and overlapping of functions.

The root difficulty here is in unregenerate human nature. Every department wants reorganization and economy—but it wants them only for the other departments. Every Congressman wants the Government to save money—but not by separating any of his own constituents from the pay roll. Every community is willing that the Government shall spend less money, on the whole, for public buildings, Army posts, navy yards, and the like—but it flies to arms if the curtailment reaches into its own midst.

What has lately been happening in connection with the President's effort to pare down the Budget for the next fiscal year is illustrative of the difficulties in the way of effective economy in Government.

THAT NAVY TEMPEST

The President asks the Navy Department to cut a certain sum from its estimates. Immediately the advocates of a big Navy (or, depending on the point of view, an adequate Navy) spring furiously into action. The chairman of the Navy League, a civilian organization, lets out a blast accusing the President of "abysmal ignorance" of the needs of the Navy. A flood of propaganda is loosed with the purpose of showing that if the President has his way the United States will sink to the level of a third-rate naval power.

There is still another reason why the taxpayer can expect only the most modest results from the President's call for reduced outlays. As has been shown he has a limited field in which to operate. Half of every dollar collected by the Government goes to pay the cost of past wars, in the form either of veterans' relief or of interest and amortization charges on the public debt. He must do his shaving on the other half—the half which pays for national defense (future wars); the general administration of the Government; sites for public buildings and their construction; general law enforcement; the promotion and regulation of commerce, industry, and agriculture; the postal deficiency; the building of roads; flood control and the improvement of rivers and harbors, and the promotion of public health, public education and scientific research.

BIG SLICE OUT OF EVERY DOLLAR

National defense, which means the upkeep of the Army and Navy and the building of armaments, has been taking close to 20 cents of the dollar, making the total chargeable to war, past and future, about 70 cents. Manifestly, if the essential Federal services are not to be crippled, there can be only cheese-paring economies in the field of activities covered by the remaining 30 cents, and no saving of this kind, however desirable it may be, can have any appreciable effect on the present financial position of the Government. It is possible, therefore, to applaud the President's economy drive without becoming optimistic as to its outcome. Real economy, translatable into terms of the taxpayer's dollar, can only be achieved by laying the ax vigorously to our expenditures for future war. Whether this should be done is a question for the people, through the Government, to decide.

V.—Should the Government in this emergency depend on borrowing or on new taxation?—How should the burden of new taxation be distributed?

Since it is not possible for the Government, by any conceivable present measures of economy, to make a saving even remotely commensurate with the size of the deficit, it is clear that more money must be found than is now being taken in.

There are two ways in which additional money can be had: By borrowing and by taxation. During the year ended October 31, the public debt was increased, through Treasury short and long term borrowing, by more than a billion dollars, or to a total of $17,291,000,000. The question that faces Congress is whether the Government should continue to meet its needs by borrowing or should resort, for all or part of the required new revenue, to increased taxes. The question is whether we should shift the burden of the deficit to the future, or, so far as practicable, pay as we go.

There is a growing belief among Congressmen that taxes should be increased. Some, like Senator Borah and Senator Norris, have held from the time the deficit first appeared that the Government should reach with a longer arm into the big incomes in the upper brackets. Others, representing the administration point of view, took the position originally that a tax increase at all costs must be avoided.

AGAINST BIGGER TAXES

Higher taxes, they said, would hurt business and thereby retard economic recovery. All the familiar arguments against cutting into the incomes of the very rich—that the whole people ultimately would pay the bill, that higher levies in the upper brackets would drive an increasing amount of wealth into tax-exempt securities, that the Government should not take money needed in industry—were heard.

It was said, moreover, that with the revival of business, which lay just around the corner, Government revenues would speedily go back to normal; the Government meantime should tide itself over the emergency with new loans, which could easily be paid off in the rosy future.

So ran the case against a tax increase, and it looked until recently as if this counsel would prevail. For one thing, it squared with the philosophy of conservative Republicanism, and, for another, it appealed to that section of the Democratic Party which is eager on the eve of a presidential election to prove that big business has nothing to fear from the Democrats. The present staggering size of the deficit—it is four times as great for the first four months of the current fiscal year as it was for the corresponding period of the previous year—has materially changed the outlook. Even some of those who previously stood against any revision of the present tax schedules have come to the reluctant conclusion that an increase to supplement the money raised by loans will be necessary.

WHO IS GOING TO PAY?

If new taxes are levied, what shall be their incidence? On this question there are, roughly speaking, two schools of thought, and the difference between them goes down to the fundamental issue that divides men in Congress (and in the Nation and the world) on every vital politico-economic question. Labels in politics are delusive, but in general it may be said that the fight is between conservatives and liberals—between those who believe that the first function of government is to establish prosperity among a privileged class at the top, whence it may diffuse itself at the direction of this class over less fortunate groups, and those who believe that government should concern itself primarily with the welfare of the mass.

A Marxian would say that the battle is merely a part of the age-long struggle between the House of Have and the House of Have Not.

This definition may oversimplify the matter, but no such objection can lie against the statement quoted approvingly by Prof. John Dewey in his book on Individualism, Old and New, that all the great political questions in Washington come back ultimately to problems connected with the distribution of income. The question of how the burden of new taxes shall be apportioned falls precisely within this category.

WEALTH'S DISTRIBUTION

We come now to a point in this article where two topics—that of the Government's depression and that of the whole people's depression—begin to converge. We reach the proposition that the Government, through its taxing power, not only can cure its depression—that is to say, close the gap between receipts and expenses—but by the radical use of that tremendous power can profoundly affect the whole economic and social structure of the country. It can help to bring about a redistribution of wealth.

Let us see, briefly, what the available evidence tells us about the present distribution of wealth. Our best source of information is the annual Statistics of Income, published by the Treasury Department.

In the calendar year 1929, the last year for which figures have been published, about 1 per cent of those making income-tax returns to the Federal Government had about 25 per cent of the aggregate income reported. Persons with incomes of more than $100,000 each, forming a little more than one-third of 1 per cent of all those reporting, had more than 17 per cent of the income. The number of taxpayers with incomes of more than $100,000 shows a steady increase from 1921 to 1929, broken only by the stock-market crash of the latter year. In 1921 the total was 2,352; in 1928 it reached the top figure of 15,977; and in 1929, according to the Treasury's preliminary report for that year, it stood at 14,701.

GROWING GREAT FORTUNES

The same progression held good in the class with more than $1,000,000 income each. Its numbers grew from 21 in 1921 to 511 in 1928, dropping in the following year (preliminary figures again) to 504. Not even the stock-market crash halted the steady upward trend of the curve representing the supremely fortunate few with incomes of more than $5,000,000 each. There were only 4 persons in this class in 1921; in 1928 there were 26; and the next year there were 36.

Figures could be piled up to show how wealth, in increasing degree, has become concentrated in the hands of a small fraction of the people, but a few more must suffice. The Federal Trade Commission, in a comprehensive study of the national wealth and income of the United States, surveyed the estates of 43,512 decedents in 24 selected counties in 13 States for the period from 1912 to 1923. It found that 1 per cent of the decedents owned 59 per cent of the estimated wealth and that 13 per cent owned 90 per cent of the wealth. The average value of all the estates was $3,800, but over 91 per cent of the decedents had estates of less than this average. The commission's tables indicate, as it conservatively says, "a rather high degree of concentration."

WHAT THE POOR OWN

It is impossible, of course, to arrive at the exact proportions in which the national wealth is distributed, but certain figures are suggestive. The Industrial Relations Commission has estimated that the rich (2 per cent) own 60 per cent of the accumulated wealth of the Nation, the middle class (33 per cent) own 35 per cent of the wealth, and the poor (65 per cent) own 5 per cent of the wealth.

Reverting to income, as distinguished from accumulated wealth, it is illuminating to note that only 1 person out of every 50 in the United States has a net income of sufficient size to require him to pay a tax upon it to the Federal Government. About 2,500,000 persons, or 2 per cent of the population, pay all that is collected under the Federal income tax; 98 per cent pay none of it. Secretary Mellon uses these figures to support his contention that the income-tax base should be "broadened." They are equally pertinent in showing the maldistribution of wealth in the United States.

INCOMES OF SUPERRICH

The 504 supermillionaires at the top of the heap in 1929 had an aggregate net income, for taxation purposes, of $1,185,000,000. These 504 persons could have purchased with this income virtually the entire wheat and cotton crops of 1930—the two chief cash crops of the Nation, representing the labor of 1,300,000 wheat farmers and 1,032,000 cotton farmers. When these figures were first put together by Dr. George L. Knapp, of the railway men's newspaper, Labor, the result was called by Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska, "one of the most astounding statements that has ever appeared in print."

Knapp further showed, from official statistics, that in comparison with the $538,664,187 net income of the 85 wealthiest taxpayers in 1929, the 421,000 workers in the cothing industry received in wages $475,318,677. In other words, "these 85 men could have paid the entire wage bill of the clothing industry and still had left for themselves about three-quarters of a million apiece."

The point need not be labored. There is growing concentration of American wealth in the hands of a few; there is steady accentuation of "the widest spread between the extremes of wealth and poverty existing in the western world." More and more, thoughtful observers who by no stretch of the imagination can be described as revolutionary or radical are calling our attention to this condition and its dangers.

SOURCES TO BE TAXED

Figures such as the foregoing led the Federal Council of Churches, in a Labor Day message, to point to the "grave imperfections in an economic order which makes possible the stark contrast of vast fortunes and breadlines," and they have prompted such a good conservative as Congressman BACHARACH, of New Jersey, a Republican member of the House Ways and Means Committee, to take a leaf from the Progressive book and propose higher surtaxes, higher estate taxes, and the reimposition of the gift tax. It would be better, says BACHARACH, for Congress to adopt a "timely program with reasonable rates than to delay until the situation becomes more desperate and the door is open to more radical legislation with unreasonable rates."

The various tax proposals coming before Congress may be grouped under two heads. On the one side are those which would "broaden" the tax base and on the other are those which would use the taxing power for the double purpose of raising revenue and breaking up, to some degree, the vast accumulations of wealth revealed by the income-tax statistics. Whether or not there will be a movement to increase income taxes in the lower brackets has not become apparent, but the drive is already under way for a general sales tax or a "selective" sales tax on such commodities as gasoline, radio sets, automobiles, and (in addition to the heavy impost they already bear) cigarettes. A sales tax is the income tax in reverse. It is large or small according to the amount consumed by the taxpayer; the income tax, called by economists one of the fairest taxes ever devised, is large or small according to capacity to pay. A sales tax bears inequitably upon persons of small means; as Prof. E. R. A. Seligman, of Columbia University, has testified, it "sins against the cardinal principle of equality in taxation." The fight for and against a sales tax brings into head-on collision the opposing theories of government which have been mentioned. The tax is advocated at this time, manifestly, in an effort to avert higher levies on the rich.

There are three main items in the opposing program: An increase in the higher brackets of the income tax, an increase in the estate tax, and the restoration of the gift tax.

Under the war-time rates, applicable through the calendar year 1921, the Government collected surtaxes running up as high as 65 per cent on amounts of income over $1,000,000. Successive general tax reductions have brought the top rate down to 20 per cent and have stopped the graduation of incomes at $100,000. The rate is 20 per cent—that is to say, no matter how small or how large the excess over $100,000.

INCOME TAXES IN GREAT BRITAIN

What has happened in respect to the taxes of the very rich can better be shown by a comparison based on the average tax per return and the average rate of tax on incomes in excess of $1,000,000. In 1918 such incomes paid to the Government an average tax of $1,326,645 and the average rate of tax worked out at 64.65 per cent. In 1928 the average tax in the same bracket was only $362,309, and the average rate of tax was $16.70.

It is interesting to observe that the supermillionaires—those with incomes of more than $1,000,000, including the topnotchers with incomes of more than $5,000,000—paid a lower average rate of tax than persons with incomes from $300,000 to $1,000,000. The Progressives in Congress are asking why the upward graduation of rates, which is effective through all the brackets from $10,000 up to $100,000, should cease at that point. It has been suggested that the rates be stepped up until they reach a maximum figure of 35 or 40 per cent on amounts of income over $500,000. Forty per cent was the maximum rate carried in the revenue act of 1924.

In urging that the bulk of any increased tax burden be laid on taxpayers with net incomes in excess of $100,000, Congressman BACHARACH pointed out that there had been an increase of more than 5,000 in the number in this class since 1925 and drew the conclusion that "the rich are getting richer and the poor poorer."

The American income-tax rates invite comparison with the British. Great Britain in 1929–30 had 130 persons with incomes of $500,000 and upward. Their average income was $930,000. We had 1,471 in this group in 1929, with an average income of $1,250,000. The total net income of the 1,471 was $1,848,585,793, on which they paid a tax of about 16 per cent, or $291,337,965. If they had been assessed at the British rates then effective, they would have paid a tax of about 48 per cent, or approximately $900,000,000.

OVEREXPANDED INDUSTRIES

One of the main arguments by which Congress on three occasions was led to reduce the surtax rates was that urgently needed money would thereby be released for the expansion of industry. From this expansion, it was said, would flow great and widely distributed benefits. If this argument ever had any validity—which is seriously to be doubted—it surely has none now. Industry to-day is tremendously overexpanded—that is its great trouble and the country's trouble. Proponents of low surtaxes have been forced to fall back on their second line of defense, the contentions that high rates (1) drive wealth into hiding and (2) are ultimately passed on to the whole people. We shall hear all the changes rung on these arguments in the coming debates.

The second item in the Progressive program calls for a sharp increase in the estate tax, and the third, a necessary accompaniment of this increase in order to prevent evasions, calls for restoration of the gift tax, which Secretary Mellon was successful in having repealed in 1926. The present estate tax runs from a minimum of 1 per cent to a maximum of 20, which is effective on amounts over $10,000,000. There is an exemption of $100,000 before the tax begins to apply, and a credit up to 80 per cent of the Federal tax is allowed on account of inheritance levies paid to the States. Prior to the estate tax act of 1926 the maximum rate was 40 per cent and the credit allowed for payments to the States was only 25 per cent.

TAX ON ESTATES

Secretary Mellon has been a constant advocate of complete repeal of the estate tax. In this position he had the warm support of President Coolidge, who argued that the field of estate taxation was one that belonged peculiarly to the States. Coolidge also said that the Government should not "seek social legislation in the guise of taxation"; that if we were going to adopt "socialism" we ought to present the issue to the people "as socialism and not under the guise of a law to collect revenue." Apparently in this philosophy it is sound enough policy for the States to adopt socialism but unwise and dangerous for the Federal Government to do it.

Secretary Mellon is strongly against the use of the estate tax as a social weapon. He says that "the social necessity of breaking up large fortunes in this country does not exist"; that "in a few generations any single large fortune is split into many moderate inheritances."

As to that, let us see. Here are some statistics read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD when the estate tax was under debate in 1926. John D. Rockefeller has given to his children $2,000,000,000. He has in his own right (1924) $500,000,000, and John D., jr., has an income of $40,000,000 a year. Bear in mind that this was several years ago; the fortunes named have materially increased since then. The Pratt fortune, of Standard Oil origin, grew from $10,000,000 to over $300,000,000 in 30 years. The Harkness fortune, also from Standard Oil, was less than $50,000,000 when Stephen V. Harkness died. It has become more than $400,000,000. Meyer Guggenheim died in 1905, leaving $50,000,000. He had nine children. His estate increased in 20 years to a sum sufficient, if divided, to give each of the children more than the original whole. The fortune of Alexius du Pont was $40,000,000. It was estimated in 1926 that the 40 descendants in the fourth and fifth generations were each worth more than that.

TWO INTERESTING DEATH TAXES

Again the argument is made that the estate tax constitutes a levy on capital. The reply to this is that even a fairly heavy tax can be liquidated through annual payments from the income of the estate if sufficient time is allowed. The estate of Harry Payne Whitney furnishes an illuminating case in point. Valued at $186,579,746 at the time of his death in 1927, it paid death taxes to the Federal Government and the States of $22,179,274, or 12 per cent of the value of the estate. Between 1927 and 1929 the estate increased in value by $52,721,270, or nearly two and a half times the amount of the death duties.

Secretary Mellon says that wealth is invested in tax-exempt securities as a means of escaping taxation; he asks for a constitutional amendment to close this loophole. If he is genuinely anxious to get at investments in tax-free securities, he can do so through a weapon immediately available, the estate tax. It is the only such weapon.

It is said that the estate tax should be left to the States. The reply is that the only authority which can levy the tax without discrimination is the Federal Government.

VIEWS OF RICH MEN

Proponents of the estate tax urge it frankly as a social weapon as well as a revenue producer. In a message to Congress in 1906, Roosevelt advocated heavy death duties, with the primary object of putting "a constantly increasing burden on the inheritance of those swollen fortunes which it is certainly of no benefit to this country to perpetuate." Andrew Carnegie wrote in his Gospel of Wealth: "Of all forms of taxation, this seems the wisest. It is difficult to set bounds to the share of a rich man's estate which should go at his death to the public through the agency of the State." Prof. Thomas S. Adams, of Yale, says that "we should raise from this source enough revenue to measurably relieve the farmers and the general taxpayers," and Prof. Seligman, of Columbia, observes that "wherever we have democracy we have two things—an income tax and an inheritance tax."

The case for the gift tax is adequately summed up by Senator COUZENS when he says: "There is no logic in an estate tax when a man, through gifts in his lifetime, can evade the tax. The gift tax would enable us to collect on transfers of property whether they were made before or after the giver's death."

VI.—Our general depression is homemade, and it is due fundamentally to the maldistribution of wealth

There is now to be considered the general depression in the United States, to which the plight of the Government is due.

Let us note some of the stages in our slow and painful progress, as a people, toward a realistic appraisal of the facts. As long ago as 1928, in the very midst of the boom times, when Coolidge was still President and John J. Raskob was telling us that all we needed to do in order to get rich was to put our money in investment trusts, a few men raised their voices in warning.

There was, for conspicuous example, the Very Rev. William R. Inge, the "gloomy dean," of St. Paul's, London, who wrote in his notable contribution to the fiftieth-aniversary edition of the Post-Dispatch, in December, 1928: "Already, I believe, there are signs that the law of diminishing returns is beginning to operate, and production is only maintained at full speed by frantic advertising. The advantages already won by the American worker, such as his cheap car, his radio, and his bathroom, are solid and permanent; but the limits of 'consumptionism'—an ugly word for which I am not responsible—are probably not far off."

CHORUS OF REASSURANCES

The small minority who dared preach this heresy were prophets without honor in the United States. Were not President Coolidge and Secretary Mellon assuring us that we had come permanently into a new and shining era? Was it not proclaimed by the Schwabs, the Insulls, and others that anybody who "sold America short" would be punished for his sins? The twin bubbles of industrial overexpansion and of stock-market speculation continued to grow. When the market bubble burst in the fall of 1929 the prophets of continuing prosperity said the collapse was merely a chastening episode in an orgy of gambling. There was no connection, they said, between the break and the condition of the Nation's business. From the mimeograph machines of the administration came a flood of statements, for months on end, that American industry was fundamentally sound.

When it became evident to the least observant that something, after all, was wrong with industry—when the buying not only of jewelry and furs by the speculators but of shoes and groceries by the rest of the people began to fall off, and men were seen walking the streets in search of work—when these things happened, the tune was changed. It was admitted that depression had come to America, but this unhappy condition, it was said, was due to world-wide forces over which we had no control. That the industrial captains of the United States could be at fault was unthinkable. That we as a people could be at fault was even more unthinkable. We are caught, said the publicists, official and otherwise, in a net not of our own making. Along with this easy diagnosis ran another—that the depression was largely psychological. Advertisements were inserted in the newspapers by various business organizations exhorting the people to resume buying and promising that if they did this prosperity would soon come back.

FINDING OUT THE TRUE REASONS

Above a din compounded of facile explanations, of depression blues, and of happiness choruses led by the Raskobs and the Dr. Julius Kleins, certain clear voices of economists and of some of the more thoughtful industrial and political leaders began, in the spring of 1931, to make themselves heard. Dissenting from the carefully propagandized theory of world-wide responsibility for the American depression, these men brought a new note of realism and sincerity into the discussion.

Dean Donham, of Harvard, for one, said in an interview published in the Post-Dispatch in May that our economic troubles had been intensified, but not caused, by the world depression. He said that our recovery was not necessarily dependent upon world recovery. Taking issue with the theory that we should seek a vast expansion of our export trade, Dean Donham said the better course was to build up purchasing power at home. He pointed out that our export trade was less than 10 per cent of our total production; this indicated to him that the domestic market always had been our principal consumer and that we should look to it rather than to foreign markets for future expansion.

The views of the Harvard dean were echoed presently, in another Post-Dispatch interview, by Senator COUZENS of Michigan, "Our depression," he said, "would have come whether there was a world depression or not. Why? Because for a long period before the crash our production had been outrunning our consumption. The workers were producing more than they could buy with the wages they received. Our predicament is primarily due to the inequitable distribution of the earnings of industry as between capital and labor. I have not seen a single denial of that statement—even by the bankers who are urging wage reductions."

HOME MARKET EXCELS FOREIGN

"Dean Donham," added the millionaire Senator, "is everlastingly right. We've gone crazy on the subject of exports. * * * Our manufacturers have the best market in the world right at their doors, providing they pay their workers sufficient wages to buy what the workers produce."

Other distinguished experts could be called to the stand in support of this diagnosis, but only one more need be heard. This is President Hoover. We turn to his speech to the editors at Indianapolis last June. He was arguing, it is true, that world influences accounted in large degree for our depression, but on the subject of the part played by the decline of our exports this is what he said:

"Our average annual production of movable goods before the depression was about $50,000,000,000. We exported yearly about five billions, or 10 per cent. The world disruption has temporarily reduced our exports to about three and one-half billions. In other words, the shrinkage of foreign trade by one and one-half billions amounts to only 2 or 3 per cent of our total productivity. Yet as a result of all the adverse forces our production has been reduced by, roughly, ten or twelve billions. This sharp contrast between a national shrinkage of, say, twelve billions, and a loss of one and one-half billions from export trade is an indication of the disarrangement of our own internal production and consumption entirely apart from that resulting from decreased sales abroad."

And in the same speech the President said, in opposing a large bond issue for new public works, that "the remedy for economic depression is not waste, but the creation and distribution of wealth."

(Italic letters are the writer's.)

"HALF STARVED, HALF GORGED"

It is not intended here to minimize the importance of foreign trade in our national economy. A healthy volume of exports is greatly to be desired; to some businesses, it represents the margin between profit and loss. The point is simply that the shrinkage we have experienced in a trade which consumes, at best, less than 10 per cent of our total annual production is only one factor, and a very small factor, in our depression.

We have reached, at last, a stage in our national thinking in which it is being more and more widely understood, and more and more generally proclaimed by thoughtful leaders of opinion, that our present depression is primarily of our own making, and that the underlying cause is the maldistribution of wealth. In terms less pungent but meaning the same thing, an ever-increasing number of upholders of the capitalistic order, men of the type of Senator COUZENS and Daniel Willard and the others quoted in the introduction to this article, are saying, with the picturesque Governor Murray, of Oklahoma, that "just as a nation could not live half free and half slave, so this republic can not continue half starved and half gorged."

MIDDLE GROUND BECKONS

Looking abroad, these inquiring minds see two significant national experiments. They see Soviet Russia slowly retreating from its originally declared policy of pure communism; they see England (notwithstanding the apparent check given the movement by the last elections) going steadily and with seemingly fixed intention away from unrestricted capitalism. They see both these nations seeking a tenable middle ground, and they are asking whether the United States, in order to prevent a swing to the left, should not consciously turn its face toward the middle.

Men who are not afraid to question the wisdom of unrestricted capitalism—which is practically what we have to-day—are the real conservators of our institutions. The real threat to them comes not from the handful of communists in our midst but from the conservative extremists who are not willing to yield an inch. There is vastly more danger to the established order from the economic reactionaries in Congress than there is from the so-called radicals.

WHY MILLIONS CAN NOT BUY

After the admission that our depression was homemade, it became fashionable to attribute it to "overproduction," and that word, together with "underconsumption," still runs through public discussion of the problem. Both these words express only part of the truth—they do not go to the root cause of our troubles. That cause can only be found in the distribution of the national wealth, in a system, or lack of system, which permits—to cite but one glaring result—36 persons in the United States to receive an annual income averaging nearly $10,000,000 each, or, in the aggregate, a greater income, after all the deductions allowed by law, than the sum of the wages paid to the 428,000 persons employed in the manufacture of cotton goods.

Under this system only 2 per cent of the people have incomes large enough to interest the Federal tax collector. The other 98 per cent, obviously, have little or no share in the country's prosperity. Gov. Harry Woodring, of Kansas, in a Fourth of July speech, called the depression a "panic of plenty," and that is precisely what it is. There is plenty of everything in the country. The trouble is that the millions of unemployed and underemployed lack the means to buy what they could use—lack, in many thousands of cases, the means of decent subsistence. This is the reason for "underconsumption."

VII.—How the machine has accelerated the growth of this economic disease

Some of the writers in the fiftieth-anniversary edition of the Post-Dispatch said the machine age, with its wholesale displacement of workers, did not really begin until 1920. Why, then, did not large-scale unemployment begin at the same time? The answer is, first, that large numbers of workers were absorbed by new industries, such as those connected with radio transmission and receiving sets; and, second, that the sales and advertising divisions of industry were enormously expanded. Coincident with the latter development was the introduction on a huge scale of personal-credit and time-payment sales plans. Dean Inge's reference to our "frantic advertising" has been noted. This frantic campaign, plus time payments, enabled the producers to dispose of the output of their machines far longer than would otherwise have been possible.

WHAT STOPPED SALES SPREE

Sales would be booming to-day if the credit manager, an obscure fellow usually stuck off in a dark corner of the great offices, had not made himself heard. One day, when the sales manager came in with John Doe's paper for a new automobile, a new electric icebox, a new radio, or a new Heaven-knows-what, the credit manager rebelled. "I can't take any more of John Doe's paper," he said. "I have a bale of it now, and he is behind on interest and principal." This went on all over the country. It helped to bring about the collapse of the installment business, which, of course, was soon followed by the breakdown of jobbing and manufacturing.

Whether in the cosmic view of things the machine is a blessing to mankind or a curse is a question for the philosopher. It need not detain us here. For the machine, whatever we may think of it, is with us to stay, and our problem is so to readjust its effects as to minimize its evils and equitably distribute its benefits.

The maldistribution of wealth is the fundamental cause of our economic sickness. If we liken society to a tree, we may say that disease has attacked the roots, causing the tree to give off instead of the luxuriant foliage of which it is capable the withered leves of unemployment. The progress of this disease, this concentration of vast wealth in a few hands, has been greatly accelerated in the last 10 years by the machine.

REAL BENEFICIARIES OF MACHINES

The true function of the machine is to spread leisure, which is the highest expression of wealth, through the whole mass of society. From this use it has been increasingly perverted. Wealth has grown amazingly, and with it has grown the possibility of the "good life"—leisure with the means to enjoy it—for an ever-widening circle of workers. The measure by which we have fallen short of this ideal is the measure of the failure of capitalism as now organized. How far short we have fallen the stark figures testify. The wealth created by the machine has gone in appalling disproportion to the owners of the machine. To the millions of manual workers displaced by the machine it has given not leisure with the means to enjoy it but the evil twin of leisure, which is idleness. The perversion of the machine from its proper use has brought about our present condition of unemployment.

CAPITAL AS GRAVEDIGGER

Realization of the close relation between unemployment and "purchasing power" has been forced upon the owners of the machine. They see a vicious circle nearing completion. They see the products of the machine, which heretofore have spelled ever-increasing wealth, beginning to appear in part as dross. For no product of the machine has any real value until it is put to use. It can not be put to use until somebody buys it, and the number of buyers has been progressively decreased by the growth of unemployment. Just as profits increased during an earlier stage of the circle, so now they decrease.

What is the remedy? How are we to prevent the fulfillment of Marx's prophecy, in the communist manifesto of 1848, that capitalism in the end will provide "its own gravediggers"? In the opinion of many thoughtful observers, there is only one possible answer: Human greed must curb itself or be curbed. There must be shorter work hours, so that all who need work may find it, and this change must be effected not at the expense of wages but, as Senator COUZENS and others have bluntly said, at the expense of profits. It is not merely the wage scale that must be kept up but the amount of wages that a worker receives over the course of a year. This is only another way of saying that what we need, fundamentally, is a broader distribution of the profits of industry.

Let us take for illustration the case of a pioneer farmer with four sons. They worked every available minute to make a living for the family and a modest surplus against misfortune. When the first machine came in, enabling the father to carry on with two sons, he did not turn the other two adrift. Father and sons all worked shorter hours and all enjoyed the virtues of the machine and escaped its evils. This is precisely what is being proposed to industry to-day by the advocates of shorter work hours. The owners of the machine are being asked to share more of its benefits with the workers. Theoretically, if the present ratio of distribution of benefits is continued, the owners will find themselves, in the final stage of the machine's evolution, with great plants on their hands and nobody to buy their products. The masses of the people, through the operation of unemployment, will have starved to death. With no "purchasing power" to give value to the machines, they will be no better than junk, and the owners will have to start grubbing a living out of the land. Capitalism will then have provided its own gravediggers.

WHEN WAGES LAGGED

It is sometimes argued that labor has nothing to complain of, since labor in the flush days before the depression was highly rewarded. However large was the proportion of profits taken by capital, runs this contention, labor also got a full share of benefits. Therefore, it is said, labor can have no just grievance now if its wages are cut. This is the typical banking argument for the reduction of wages.

There has been no better answer to this specious line of reasoning than that given by Senator COUZENS in the interview to which we have referred. "Notwithstanding the general assumption that wages were high," he said, "all available statistics show that during the years preceding the depression the increase in productivity per man was greater than the increase in wages. In other words, although the worker got more money, he produced still more goods. Somebody got the difference, and we all know who it was. The strange thing is that the fellows who got it couldn't see that they were spoiling their own game."

SOME COMPARATIVE FIGURES

There are, as Senator COUZENS says, ample figures to prove his point. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, gave some of them in a speech before the Progressive conference in Washington last spring. Between 1919 and 1929, he showed, the productivity of industry in the United States increased 50 per cent, while real wages paid the workers increased only 27.5 per cent. He challenged any economist to tell him how the country could continue on that ratio and still consume the products of industry.

He gave some other illuminating statistics. In 1899 the value of goods produced in the United States was $11,406,927,000. The wage bill was $2,808,361,000. Labor, that is, got 17.5 per cent of the value of the goods produced. In 1929, this value rose to $69,417,516,000 and the amount paid in wages rose to $11,421,631,000. The percentage of wages to the value of goods was 16.5, or less than it was in 1899.

VIII.—The wages of capital and the wages of labor—The balance between consumption and production can only be restored at the expense of dividends.

If the views of all those discussing the subject are distilled we find that they are in agreement as to the condition prevailing in the country to-day—relative overproduction and lack of purchasing power. This situation may be more accurately stated as the maldistribution of wealth, the primary cause of which is the disproportion between the wages of capital and the wages of labor As this disproportion grows, it tends to aggravate overproduction, for the gains of capital are constantly being thrown into new industry and business in order to produce more capital. Thus the bubble of overexpanded industry is blown up till it breaks. From whatever angle we approach the problem we are led inevitably to the conclusion that we can not hope to prevent the recurring crises in the business "cycle" unless we are willing to attack the basic cause of the trouble. Any cure which does not probe to the bottom can have but temporary value.

THE "CUT" OF CAPITAL

At the risk of repetition, the problem may be restated in terms of the labor hour. This is the foundation on which rests the creation of wealth. A man is able in a work day to create wealth equivalent to his necessaries for subsistence and something over. The employer gets together a number of laborers and receives all or part of this surplus for himself. His income is in proportion to the number of human-labor hours which he controls and out of which he makes his profit. If the employer installs a machine which enables 1 man to produce in 8 hours, let us say, the equivalent of 80 human-labor hours, then the employer is in the same position with respect to income as if he had 10 men instead of 1 working for him.

Now, the vital difference between the wages of capital and the wages of labor is this: The labor hour once expended is nonexistent, but the product of the labor hour turned over to the employer and by him exchanged for capital goes on working forever. That is, the workman's labor hour does its share in supporting his life for a day and then expires. The employer takes his profits and invests them, and thereafter for the rest of his life and the lives of his heirs and assigns forever these profits are capable of working and producing more profits for whoever controls them.

Of course it will be objected that this is too simple a statement of the case, but fundamentally it tells the story. It will be objected, for one thing, that the laborer by thrift and industry can save money and graduate into the capitalist class. This is true, but only to a very small degree. And if everybody could become rich and retire to live on his profits, the whole capitalistic structure would collapse when the last worker laid down his tools. Why is this? Because, as stated, only labor can create wealth, and enough labor must be in operation all the time to create the wealth—the goods—needed by all the people.

PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION

Dropping fancies and considering only prospective realities, we see that a balance must be maintained between production and consumption. This, again, is a point on which all the debaters are in agreement. At this time production exceeds consumption. Obviously, balance can be reestablished or approximated, since there are only two factors in the problem, by subtracting from one and adding to the other. In practice, consumption or purchasing power must be maintained on the level of production, which latter can be controlled and stabilized by a progressive decrease in the number of labor hours as invention and improvements increase the output per labor hour. But this remedy will be effective to maintain purchasing power on a level with production only if wages are kept on a level that will give the worker, per year, a sufficient income for his reasonable needs. And this, as we have shown, can only be done at the expense of dividends.

IX.—The issue is drawn between labor and capital—Solution of the problem rests primarily with industry and not with the Government

Within the last few weeks the issue has been clearly drawn between labor and capital. We see it crystallized in two statements—that of the American Federation of Labor at its Vancouver convention and that of a special committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

In demanding the 5-day week in industry, the federation adopts the slogan of "work for all." Through its spokesman, President Green, it says: "Labor will no longer subscribe to the doctrine that work and relief must be conferred; it now holds that the right to work is fundamental and is as sacred as the right to enjoy freedom, life, liberty, and happiness." (Italic letters are the writer's.)

This is radically new doctrine. In our Constitution, grounded as it is in property rights, nothing is said of the right to work; to the contrary, there are the fifth and fourteenth amendments, construed by the Supreme Court to cover a wide area, with their inhibitions against the taking of private property save by "due process of law." The question therefore arises: Can the Government under the Constitution compel private industry, through the 5-day week, to reduce its share of the benefits of the machine?

WORK DAYS AND CONSTITUTION

It has been held in numerous cases that efforts of State regulatory commissions to fix a lower return for public utilities than a "fair" return as defined by the courts were attempts at "confiscation." If the 5-day week means anything, it means the 5-day week without a cutting of the weekly wage. The American Federation does not say this, but it is implicit in the demand for shorter work hours. Anything else would be a mere palliative; it would not restore the balance between production and purchasing power that we have seen to be essential. This balance can only be restored and maintained at the expense of the profits of capital. Hence the 5-day week, with its necessary concomitant in lower profits, would be an apparent invasion of property rights; in the meaning of the law it would be "confiscatory," and the courts, bound by the rules laid down by the Constitution, in all probability, would so hold.

It may be contended that the Supreme Court's favorable decision on the Adamson Act of 1916, which gave the 8-hour day to railroad workers, warrants a different conclusion. But it must be remembered that the railroads are not on the same footing as industry in general. The business of the railroads, as the court has repeatedly said, is charged with a public interest and the right of Congress to regulate them under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution is beyond dispute. The Adamson law was rushed through Congress to meet the threat of a general railroad strike; and while it fixed the 8-hour day standard permanently, it fixed wages only for a limited term of months, to bridge the gap until the contending parties could arrive at a wage standard of their own.

WAGES PRIVATE MATTER

The court held that the power of Congress to establish an 8-hour day on the railroads did not beget the power to fix wages. "The right to fix by agreement between the carrier and its employees a standard of wages to control their relations," said the court, "is primarily private." Notwithstanding the narrow application of the law, 4 of the 9 Justices of the Supreme Court—Day, Pitney, Van Devanter, and McReynolds, the latter 2 of whom are still on the bench—dissented from the majority finding on the ground that the act was an unconstitutional invasion of property rights.

Whether we like it or not, the conclusion must be that through no orderly political process short of amendment of the Constitution can we reasonably expect the Government to effect redistribution of wealth through the device of shorter work hours at a maintained wage.

The problem of restoring the balance between production and purchasing power is primarily the problem of industry itself. Our Government, as we shall show, can not be absolved of responsibility; there is, indeed, a heavy burden of responsibility upon it; but it rests with industry to do the things most needful to be done if the disease at the root of the tree is to be cured. Will industry act to save itself? Will it curb the thirst for more profits that in the final analysis is the cause of our depression?

"The business leaders of the country," says Senator COUZENS, "have the ability to solve the problems of the depression. The trouble is that they personally have not been hurt. True, their profits have fallen off, but they are living just as comfortably as they were. Let them face actual deprivation of the sort that the workers are undergoing, and they would put their heads together and pull the country out of this slump. Dan Willard told the truth when he said that what they lack is the will to do."

At least, to a very large degree, industry could "adjust production to consumption" without Government intervention or any central planning board, if it were so disposed. The control of the situation is in a remarkably few hands. As shown in a recent article in the American Economic Review, 200 corporations with fewer than 2,000 directors control 35 to 45 per cent of the business wealth of the United States (excluding from business wealth that of the Government, agriculture, and the professions), and these corporations are growing three times as fast as 300,000 smaller corporations.

WHAT INDUSTRY MIGHT DO

Great industrial organizations could do what the crossroads merchant does—provide seasonally for the demand which experience has told him is to be expected. Instead, industry has followed the policy of steaming up production to the highest possible speed and then telling the sales manager to go out and sell the stuff. As we have seen, the great business peak of 1929 was made possible, in part, by the new market created by time payments and "frantic" advertising, and the collapse came when even that rich new market became quickly oversupplied. What has kept industry from putting on the brakes is, of course, the desire for larger and larger dividends.

Parenthetically, an interesting contrast between industrial conditions here and in France may be noted. The United States lives on the future and France on the past. That is to say, American industry is so overexpanded that it exists largely upon sales which can only be paid for out of the future earnings of the mass of the people.

French industry does business largely on a cash basis. The French pay for what they buy to-day with the savings of yesterday, and, as Mark Seguin, French consul in St. Louis, said recently in a radio speech, French industry never expands in anticipation of increased demand nor does it do much to stimulate demand. It follows the conservative policy of meeting current demand and really prefers that demand should exceed supply.

MODIFIED FASCISM

In contrast with labor's manifesto are such proposals as those of the chamber of commerce and Gerard Swope, both of which look to a kind of fascism. Schemes of this sort would set up a business dictatorship with the Government as a benevolent overlord. They would require the scrapping of the antitrust laws, which are designed to protect the people against extortion, and the substitution of laws designed primarily to protect business from slumps. The welfare of the people, in this new philosophy, would be subordinated to the welfare of business. Mergers and combinations, on a scale ever more grandiose, would be the fount from which all blessings would flow. If this, as some say, is the destined next development of the machine age, it is well that we should recognize it frankly for what it is—the negation of our boasted individualism—and not let ourselves be taken in by the delusive terminology of the big-business propagandists. We should see that what is proposed is the Soviet Russian system, except that the profits which there go to the state would here be in the hands of private business.

In none of the "stabilization" plans put forward by business is it conceded that the "right to work," as asserted by labor, is fundamental and sacred. The chamber of commerce, it is true, urges that work be "rotated" during the present emergency in order that employment may be spread among "the largest possible number of employes in accordance with their needs." But this falls a long way short of accepting labor's thesis. It is, in fact, a restatement of the doctrine of "conferred work and relief" to which labor specifically objects.

X.—But there are certain important things the Government can do—a possible program covering taxation, the tariff (with a note on the plight of the farmer), the public utilities, the 5-day week for Federal employees, prohibition, our part in world affairs.

We come now to the important question of what the Government, within the framework of the Constitution, can do toward ending our "panic of plenty" and preventing the recurrence of similar conditions in the future. What is the answer to the unthinking who cry out, at the appearance of each new symptom of a basic economic disorder, "Let the Government act"?

The question is not what might be done under a dictatorship, either of the proletariat as in Russia or a fascism as in Italy, but what can be done now, or in the not astronomical future, in the United States. Even the experience of Great Britain, in its groping for a tenable middle ground between communism and unregulated capitalism, provides but a partial analogy. For the British governmental system, in contrast with the rigidity imposed by our Constitution (the "rat-trap rigidity," as Winston Churchill has called it), is highly flexible. The British Government can move quickly through orders in council, and new public questions, arising unexpectedly, can be submitted to the people and decided by them at the polls within a few weeks. British political leaders, moreover, appear to have moved farther than ours toward acceptance of the view that politics is "concentrated economics." They are willing to make temporary changes, as in the matter of the tariff, to meet emergencies, whereas American politicians tend to be hidebound in devotion to historic concepts of national policy.

SOURCES OF GREAT WEALTH

It may be laid down as fundamental, before we proceed to an examination of specific remedies, that in the United States there are four great sources of wealth and income whose relation to the general public differs from that of other sources. These are: (1) Natural resources, such as oil, minerals, and water power; (2) transportation—the railroads; (3) other public utilities; (4) tariff-protected manufactures. There is here, of course, a certain degree of overlapping, but roughly the classification will stand. The reason why these sources of wealth differ from the others is that the Government, in one way or another, intervenes in their affairs. It is possible within the space limits of this discussion to state only briefly the nature of this intervention. The Government permits (1) the exploitation for private gain of resources that belong naturally to the whole people; it undertakes, (2) and (3), to assure a "fair" rate of return not only upon actual money investment but also upon values donated (as in the case of land grants to the railroads) or created by the people; and to certain manufacturers (4) it grants a tariff far in excess of any rates conceivably needed for "protection"; this tariff is a subsidy which the public pays for the benefits of a favored few.

Now, if these four sources yield a considerable proportion of the income of the country—as they do—it follows that the withdrawal of Government intervention on their behalf, or its modification or employment in a different direction, would affect the distribution of wealth favorably to the general public.

We are confronted with an enormous paradox. The spectacle of the Government intervening with its antitrust laws (which it is now being besought to modify or repeal) for the protection of the many against a predatory few, and, on the other hand, intervening with the high tariff laws for the benefit of a few at the expense of the many.

THE SIMPLE SOMETIMES COMPLEX

Obviously, then, there are measures by which the Government, notwithstanding its constitutional limitations, can materially influence the flow of wealth. And by this we do not mean the picayunish things that are sometimes urged upon it as cure-alls by those who mistake the symptoms for the disease or confuse the Government's depression with the general depression or merely feel that the Government "ought to do something." If the administration cuts expenses, there may be a bad effect upon business and individuals. If it buys less paper, for example, the paper industry is hurt; and if it lays off clerks, unemployment is increased, individuals suffer, and business generally is adversely affected through the resultant decrease of "purchasing power." Things of this sort are merely robbing Peter to pay Paul.

We have recently seen the quandary in which the Interstate Commerce Commission found itself when the railroads asked for a general 15 per cent freight rate increase. The commission desired to help the railroads out of their undoubtedly serious predicament, but it could only do so, as soon became evident from its hearings, at the expense of other industries, especially agriculture, which is even worse off than the railroads.

Again, it has been proposed that the Government engage in a great public-works building program, at a cost of three to five billion dollars, in order to aid general industry and provide employment. Economists are divided on this proposal. Some of them, including men of distinction in their field, believe that such a program would be appreciably helpful in lifting us out of the depression. But it would be at best a palliative, and it would immediately increase the operating costs of the Government, the excess of which over its income is the cause of what we have called the Government's depression.

FIRST, THE TAX LAW

What remedial measures of permanent value are open to the Government?

First. As already has been pointed out, the Government could help to check the drift of wealth into a few hands and at the same time obtain needed revenue for itself by imposing heavy surtaxes on great fortunes, increasing death duties, and reinstalling the gift tax. It could tax swollen individual incomes to such a point as almost to remove the incentive for piling up vast personal fortunes, a condition which has been approximated in the Scandinavian countries.

Second. It could reduce the tariff to schedules sufficiently only to protect American business and American jobs from immediate destructive competition. The classic argument of the protectionists is that a high tariff is necessary to the maintenance of high wages. This is untrue. Wages are high in the United States as compared with Europe not because of our tariff wall but because of the greater productivity of American labor, our superior manufacturing technique, and our vastly greater natural resources. Reduction in the tariff would be reflected in lower prices to the consumer. It would be of particular benefit to the farmer, part of whose plight is due to the fact that he must buy in a protected and sell, by reason of the nature of his product, in an unprotected market. The resultant disparity in prices has long been an important factor in his depression. Reduction in the tariff would operate against the concentration of wealth, which has brought about the present overexpansion of industry and its consequent stagnation.

HELP FROM LOWER TARIFFS

Lowering of the tariff would hurt only a minute fraction of the people, and they would be hurt only to the extent of their excess profits above a reasonable return on investment. According to the estimate of the late Joseph S. McCoy, actuary of the Treasury, there are only about 3,300,000 individual stockholders in the United States, and the Post-Dispatch has shown (in an article October 13, 1929) that not more than one-tenth of these are in tariff-protected corporations. They are the only persons who would suffer any direct loss from a downward revision of the tariff to a reasonable basis. Since the enactment of the Hawley-Smoot bill—enacted by Congress and signed by the President in plain violation of the President's call for a sharply "limited" revision—the reprisals of foreign nations have added new weight to the demand for lower duties. No one can doubt that the Hawley-Smoot law (which Senator WATSON, of Indiana, said would bring back prosperity in 30 days) has played a leading part in the strangulation of world trade and in driving Great Britain to reconsider its hostoric free-trade policy.

Not only the congenital advocates of low schedules but powerful leaders in big business, including Thomas W. Lamont, a partner in J. P. Morgan & Co., are demanding a revision. A characteristic view is that of Dr. B. M. Anderson, economist, in a bulletin issued by the Chase National Bank of New York. "American labor," he says, "has nothing to fear and everything to gain, by and large, from a lowering of the tariffs in the United States. I propose such a reduction as will avoid a further drift of population from country to city, and further abandonment of farms. I propose a reduction not in the interest of readjustment and change, but in the interest of stability."

WHY FARMERS WOULD BENEFIT

Since the tariff bears so intimately upon the farm problem, this is as good a place as any to mention the particular depression of agriculture. There is space for only a bare outline of that tragic story. The farmer has had depression with him for a decade. In that time his land values have shrunk from $66,000,000,000 to $48,000,000,000, his income has declined from $12,000,000,000 to $9,500,000,000, and his taxes have increased 172 per cent. In the five years from 1926 to 1930, inclusive, 682,850 farms, or more than one-tenth of the number in the United States, were lost to their owners through forced sales. The economic distress of the farmer is closely bound up with the general condition of the country. The chamber of commerce is within conservative bounds when it says: "This country can not be permanently prosperous until it has a reasonably prosperous agricultural population. Ten million workers and 30,000,000 people are dependent upon the farm for their support. A large proportion, perhaps the majority, are receiving meager return for long and arduous labor."

PUBLIC UTILITIES

Coming back to the matter of specific weapons which the Government has power to invoke against the increasing concentration of wealth, we reach, third, the privately owned public utilities. "Judicial orders and decrees," as Samuel Untermyer has said, have placed a deadly handicap on the regulation of public utilities by State commissions. If these utilities were publicly owned, the advocates of that policy argue, huge sums in profits would be diverted from the few hands into which they have been made to flow through the device of the holding companies. Profits could be distributed to the public through reduction in rates, or decreased taxes.

Congress has twice proposed Government operation of the Muscle Shoals power plant, only to have its action meet two presidential vetoes.

Doctor Coffman, president of the University of Minnesota, has said that "the chief weakness of a democratic people is its unwillingness or its inability to set up remote goals and to strive to attain them." If it wishes, the Government can set up the goal, remote or otherwise, of complete Government ownership of the railroads. The Government could take over the railroads with the proceeds of a long-term bond issue, cut out the waste and duplication in the present service, and charge rates sufficient to pay whatever net revenue on the investment it might decide upon. It is for the people, through their representatives, to say whether this shall be done.

SHORTER-WEEK POSSIBILITIES

Fourth. The Government could make itself a model employer by establishing the 5-day week for Federal employees without change of pay. Just as the Adamson law became a great weapon of persuasion in the hands of organized labor, so this reduction of working hours without reduction of pay by the Federal Government would have a progressive influence in private industry. Bills for the 5-day week in the Federal service will be introduced in the coming session of Congress.

Fifth. The Government could repeal prohibition. It is unnecessary here to review the arguments for and against prohibition. Repeal would increase the revenue of the Government, decrease its expenses, and aid general business and employment to some extent. In a business way, the principal, if not the sole, sufferer from repeal would be the bootleg traffic.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Sixth. The Government could promote international stability, and thereby contribute to the improvement of general conditions at home, by joining the League of Nations. Former Premier Baldwin, of Great Britain, with the guarded speech which marks the public utterances of British statesmen on the subject, said at a great peace meeting in London last summer: "It is not for us to cajole or advise the United States to get into the League of Nations, yet I tell you that every international problem since the Versailles treaty has been made imponderably more difficult because of the absence of the United States from the league."

We have seen what are the costs of war to the American people. The expenditures of the other great nations are on a similar or larger scale. As President Hoover recently told the International Chamber of Commerce, five and a half million men are actively under arms in the world to-day and 20,000,000 more are in reserve. The world is spending on armaments the colossal sum of $5,000,000,000 annually. Some progress has been made toward decrease in naval disarmament since the war, but not much.

PROSPECTS OF DISARMAMENT

There is to be held at Geneva next February, under the auspices of the League of Nations, the first general disarmament conference. It will deal with the land, sea, and air armaments of all the nations. The alternative to the success of this fateful conference, Viscount Cecil has said "is too sinister for any man or woman of good sense and good will to contemplate." In the view of official Washington, the outlook for success is not bright. Can anyone doubt that it would be immeasurably better if the United States were in the league and not out of it?

France demands additional treaty "security" before she will consent to any material reduction in her armament. This we have declined to grant. We have even refused to enter into a mild pact calling for "consultation" if war threatens in the Atlantic. France's demand is the great stumbling block in the way of success at Geneva. There is ground for her thesis. We may feel that ours is the better one—that security will follow reduction of armament—but we have got to admit the logic in the French position. There would be no logic in it if we were a member of the league.

If the United States, richest and strongest of the nations, were in the league, article 16 of the covenant—the sanctions article—would mean something. As it is the article has small virtue, perhaps none. Certainly the members of the league will hesitate to coerce a covenant-breaking state so long as the United States remains on the outside. This was plainly shown in a memorandum of the British Government in 1925, in which it was stated that any effort to enforce sanctions would put upon Britain the responsibility of cutting maritime communications between the offending nation and the United States. In view of the historic American doctrine of the freedom of the seas this course would involve a risk of conflict with the United States which the British Government, said its memorandum, did not care to assume.

BOUND TO BE INVOLVED

The international police club placed in the covenant by article 16 was in effect taken out of it when the United States refused to join the league. But the chances of our being drawn into war have not been reduced. We have a finger in every big financial pie in the world, and because of this fact we stand alert at the drumbeats of war in any region.

We seek to use the league, as in the present Manchurian crisis, when it suits our convenience to do so. Should we not, then, accept a share of its responsibilities? One thing is certain: If another world cataclysm comes, our aloofness from the league will not make us immune. Everything else aside, our purse strings have tied us, even more inescapably than in 1917, to the rest of the world. The war changed us from a debtor to a creditor Nation. Our stake abroad has gone up by great leaps; at the end of 1930 it stood at $17,500,000,000, exclusive of the war debts. Enlightened self-interest should take us into the league.

WAR DEBTS A TRADING POINT

What of the war debts? A growing body of opinion holds we could well afford to trade them off for the armament reduction that would be made possible by our entrance into the league. The sum of them bulks large, but the annual payments to us are only 6 per cent of our normal Budget. The saving to us in armament costs would offset the loss of these payments. Cancellation of the debts, with a reciprocal cut in German reparations by the former Allies, would hasten the economic recovery of Germany and the world. If by the same means we should effect a measurable reduction of armaments throughout the world, which reduction would be reflected in lower government costs and lower taxes, the total result would make the price, by comparison, infinitesimally small.

To say, with Mr. Coolidge, of our debtors that "they hired the money" and must pay it back is to ignore the plain facts. We are not going to war to collect the debts. Nicholas Murray Butler has said: "You might just as well try to make somebody pay the cost of the sunset as to pay the cost of the war. It can not be done."

Anything we might buy with the debts in the way of world peace or prosperity would be clear gain. Unquestionably the debts have a trading value.

XI.—Conclusion: Conceivably we can usher in a new prosperity through a readjustment of the distribution of the benefits of the machine—Amendment of men's economic and social ideals is the great need

Restoration of world prosperity would help us, but there would remain the great underlying problem that this article has sought to outline—the problem of how to bring about the readjustment made necessary by the concentration of too great wealth, with the aid of the machine, in comparatively few hands. Is the machine to be the servant or the master of the people? This is a question that each nation must answer for itself.

Through a shorter work week, without reduced pay, conceivably we in the United States could so diffuse the benefits of the machine among the people that "purchasing power" would be brought back to the production level and the Nation set on the way to a new prosperity—a healthier prosperity than that of the vaunted Coolidge era. This, as we have shown, can only be done through the voluntary or enforced renunciation of excessive profits. The alternative is public or private relief, or both, for the workers displaced by the machine.

Justice Brandeis once said: "Instead of amending the Constitution, I would amend men's economic and social ideals." And that, whatever else we may do or try to do, clearly must be accomplished if we are to solve the problem of the great depression.

PROPOSED BROADCASTING OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution, which I ask may be read, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be reported for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 28) submitted by Mr. HOWELL on the 9th instant and referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That a special select committee of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized and directed to investigate the practicability of broadcasting proceedings of the United States Senate, and to report to Congress as soon as practicable the results of such investigation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair understands that the resolution having been referred to the Committee on Rules, a motion would first have to be made to discharge the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

ADMISSION TO UNITED STATES OF FOREIGN PARTICIPANTS IN OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, there was transmitted to the Senate to-day a joint resolution, House Joint Resolution 72, which proposes to permit the temporary entry into the United States under certain conditions of alien participants in the Tenth Olympic Games, to be held in the United States in 1932. There is no objection to the joint resolution at all, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that it may be immediately considered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think it ought to go to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. WAGNER. The Labor Department, the State Department, and the Bureau of Immigration jointly drew the joint resolution and are in favor of it. It confers merely upon the foreign participants in the Olympic games the same privilege which our athletes were granted by the countries which were the hosts of the Olympic games in former years.

Mr. REED. Then, doubtless, the committee will report it out favorably almost at once.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is purely a formal matter. Similar action has been taken on every occasion of the Olympic games. The House immediately passed the joint resolution upon its being reported out from the committee. The desire of the House was that it be passed by the Senate without delay. Of course, the committee will approve it; there is no doubt about that. It relates only to the participants in the Olympic games next year.

Mr. WAGNER. I may say to the Senator that the reason for haste is that the winter Olympic games are to be held at Lake Placid in February. The participants in those games from other countries are about ready to leave their home countries. There are some 23 nations interested.

Mr. REED. Then, will the Senator defer his request long enough to allow a few of us to read the joint resolution?

Mr. WAGNER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, we may as well dispose of this matter at once. I shall have to object. I objected to a similar request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] the other day. The joint resolution ought to go to the committee. The committee can act and report it back this afternoon. I shall have to object and ask that the resolution be referred to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being heard, the joint resolution will be read twice by title and referred.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 72) to permit the temporary entry into the United States under certain conditions of alien participants and officials of the third Olympic winter games and of the games of the tenth Olympiad, to be held in the United States in 1932, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT (at 1 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.). Morning business is closed. The calendar is in order. The clerk will report the first bill on the calendar.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 263) to insure adequate supplies of wild life, plant and animal, including forests, fish, and game, for the people of the United States; to secure the correlation and most economical conduct of wild-life research and restocking and the elimination of duplication of effort and expense between the several departments of the Federal Government having to do with the same; to promote the development and extension of experimental stations for breeding; to promote studies of diseases and other factors limiting the natural supply, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not see in the Chamber the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], who reported the bill. It is apparently a very important measure. I have no objection to proceeding to its consideration, but I would not want it to pass in a perfunctory manner.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] is chairman of the Special Committee on Conservation of Wild-Life Resources. He has given a great deal of time to the subject matter contained in the bill, and I am sure is in hearty accord with its provisions and would like to have it passed. If there is any objection, however, let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over. That concludes the calendar.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the election of a President pro tempore.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Eighty-seven votes have been cast; necessary to a choice, 44. No Senator having received a majority vote, there is no election, and the Secretary will again call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRATTON (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER]. I understand that if present he would vote for Senator MOSES, and if at liberty to do so I should vote for Senator PITTMAN. I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote for Senator PITTMAN.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the preceding ballot, I withhold my vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this ballot there were 41 votes cast for Senator PITTMAN, 31 for Senator MOSES, and 13 for Senator VANDENBERG. A total of 85 votes were cast. Forty-three being necessary for a choice and no Senator having received a majority, there is no election.

Mr. WATSON obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I be indulged for just a brief statement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I should like the privilege now of observing that for several days the Senate has been voting in the election of a President pro tempore. Under an order adopted many years ago, once a President pro tempore is elected he serves until his successor is chosen, or until the end of his term of office as a Senator of the United States.

The vote on each successive ballot has shown a united front on this side of the Chamber in support of the Democratic nominee for President pro tempore. On the other side of the Chamber it has shown a division which it seems to me threatens to perpetuate itself or to continue indefinitely. I do not believe that the Senate will be justified in prolonging this contest to the prevention of the consideration of important legislation. There is now only one bill on the calendar, which is a bill reported from a special committee by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT]. It is an important measure.

So far as I am concerned, and I think I speak for the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] himself, who is cordially supported by everyone on this side of the Chamber for this distinction, unless it can be made to appear that there is a reasonable probability of bringing the issue to a conclusion I shall favor proceeding with legislation when measures of importance are presented here.

On the first ballot to-day the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] received 42 votes, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] 31, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] 1, and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] 13. On the last ballot that has been supplied to me the vote for my good friend the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] completely disappeared. I think I may be pardoned for saying that I am surprised and regretful that the Senator has not made a stronger showing in this contest. [Laughter.] His powers of argument, his knowledge of parliamentary law, his skill in legislation are all well recognized.

The significant fact is that whatever happens, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] does not gain. He comes down to battle with 31 votes—stalwart, loyal, indomitable. I do not believe the Senate is justified in entering into an arrangement, if such an arrangement were proposed, as that entered into some years ago when it was agreed that one Senator should serve as President pro tempore for a fixed period and that for a similar period another Senator should serve. Nothing is to be accomplished by such a procedure. The issue was precipitated for a test of strength in the Senate. When legislation of importance is ready for consideration, so far as I am personally concerned, I shall favor proceeding to its consideration, unless assured that there is a prospect for the election of my candidate or for some other method of reaching a solution of this very difficult issue.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT, as in executive session, laid before the Senate messages in writing from the President of the United States making sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees. (For nominations this day received see the end of Senate proceedings.)

INVESTIGATION BY TARIFF COMMISSION—LEAD

Mr. KING. Mr. President, at the last session of Congress Senate Resolution No. 441 was adopted, directing the Tariff Commission to investigate the differences in the cost of production during the calendar years 1928, 1929, and 1930, in the following domestic and foreign article: Lead; and to report thereon to the Senate as soon as possible. Soon after the resolution was adopted those who had requested me to submit it to the Senate and ask for its consideration stated that the circumstances, in their opinion, did not warrant the Tariff Commission proceeding. I immediately communicated with the chairman of the Tariff Commission, as well as a number of the members, and called their attention to the request which had been made that I have the resolution rescinded. The Senate in the meantime had adjourned so that such action was impossible. The Tariff Commission, responding to the suggestion which I made, did not proceed with the investigation. However, they had many other matters which challenged their attention. I promised that as soon as the Senate met I would move to rescind the action by which the resolution to which I have referred was adopted. I, therefore, submit a resolution rescinding the resolution to which I have referred and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 88) was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution 441, Seventy-first Congress, agreed to February 16, 1931, to investigate the production costs of lead for the years 1928, 1929, and 1930 be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

LATIN AMERICAN BONDS—THE GOLD STANDARD

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address recently delivered by Mr. Walter Lafferty before the Latin American Bondholders Association on the subject of Latin American bonds and effects of the gold standard.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Gentlemen, being a holder of Latin American bonds, you have asked me to join your association, and I have cheerfully done so. This is the first intelligent and concerted effort I have seen to do something to right matters.

The problem of preserving the integrity of South American bonds is inseparable from that of restoring world commerce and finance.

Through this organization the serious minded of North America will make common cause with the equally serious minded of Latin America and Europe in finding a way out, and in a manner to preserve present friendships and bind us closer in the future.

The paradox of distress, public and private, in the midst of plenty is subject to clarification and remedy.

Personal suffering, unemployment, and even hunger are just as great in the United States as in Latin America and the rest of the world, and the destruction of private fortunes and life's savings has been heavier here than in any other country.

"What is the matter with the world?" is a question which has for months been in the mind of every thinking person. Members of the international banking fraternity, although knowing full well what the trouble is, have not, for selfish reasons, seen fit to tell us. On the contrary, they have sought to keep us in the dark by offering the alternate alibis of "overproduction," "postwar adjustments," and "necessary cyclical depressions."

The world's credit structure is an inverted pyramid, its apex resting on a fine point of gold, and when the gold moves the least bit of the whole structure trembles.

The present disequilibrium between monetary value and property and commodity values is what is the matter with the world.

Owing to its scarcity and its being locked up in legal reserves of central banks of issue gold has taken on an artificial value which amounts to legalized extortion against those compelled to buy gold exchange to pay their debts and against those who must surrender their securities, property, and commodities for a gold-exchange dollar.

Your property, securities, or commodities, which would have readily exchanged three years ago for $100 of gold-exchange money, will not bring you more than $25 of gold-exchange money to-day.

That, and only that, is what is the matter with the world.

During the past three years hundreds of billions of world wealth, invested in good faith in railroads, real estate, and securities, have been ruthlessly wiped out and world commerce and industry prostrated and millions thrown out of employment by this ghastly spectacle of gold's failure to discharge its function as a stable and adequate medium of exchange.

They ask us to stand by the gold standard. But the gold standard has not stood by us. It has gone into hiding, into legal reserves, and to get one dollar of it or of gold-exchange money, which is the same thing, we must surrender four or five dollars' worth of property, securities, or commodities.

This situation is not only unnatural, it is repulsive. The world might as well allow its property to be destroyed by a conflagration as by such a wholly unnatural and artificial cause. The world will not much longer stand for this legalized robbery and confiscation of legitimate values, this sacrifice of manhood and womanhood, as well as private fortunes, to the whims of a pampered and worshiped tyrant, the impotent single gold standard.

There are less than eleven billions of monetary gold in the world. It has ceased to actually function as a medium of exchange, as was primarily intended, but hundreds of billions of debts and taxes are due and owing in gold exchange. This gold exchange must be bought with labor and commodities, and owing to the scarcity of gold its value has artificially skyrocketed into the heavens, while all property and commodities have taken a plunge into the depths as a necessary corollary.

Thus we find to-day a wholly artificial and actually dishonest disparity between monetary value as measured by the single gold standard, on the one hand, and property and commodity values on the other. This unnatural disparity has become so great as to shock the conscience and sense of justice of the world. It is so great and so glaring as to be inherently a fraud upon fair and honest commerce and financial dealing.

As one of the results we holders of Latin American bonds stand to lose unless we do something constructive, as some of our bonds for which we paid par are now selling at 10. And we are in the same boat with holders of domestic bonds, stocks, and real estate, and we make common cause with them in demanding a remedy now long overdue.

"Overproduction" is no longer offered even by the international single gold standard bankers as an alibi for the colossal maladjustment between monetary value and property and commodity values, for it has been shown to be notoriously false. Commodities and property not overproduced are down with the rest. Farm lands and city real estate have depreciated over half. Securities of railroads, independent banks, and great industrial plants have depreciated correspondingly with real estate. Wheat, corn, cotton, coffee, copper, rubber, tin, and other key commodities, the world need for which is normally uniform, have actually fallen below the cost of production. Hundreds of independent banks have gone under, leaving desolation and anguish in their wake.

The single gold standard has become a Frankenstein which has turned tyrant against the world and rendered its commerce and finances prostrate.

The total debt of the world is over four hundred billions as measured in dollars. Those debts must be paid, if at all, in commodities whose value must be measured by exchange for some other commodity used as money.

When we seek another commodity to add to the world's monetary base we naturally turn to silver because of its traditions and historic background. For thousands of years gold and silver were used side by side as basic money. In volume 1 of our Statutes at Large, page 248, we find where George Washington signed our first act of Congress establishing our monetary system, and it provided that the silver dollar, containing 416 grains of standard silver, should be the unit of value, and that a gold dollar, containing 27 grains of standard gold, should pass current at equal value with the silver dollar.

It is only during the past 120 years that efforts have been made from time to time in different parts of the world to make gold the sole base of all money. Great Britain first tried it in 1816, and it proved disastrous. It has since been tried there many times and as often departed from. When the seasoned financiers of Great Britain again decided to go off the single gold standard last September, it is reasonable to predict that they marked the first turn for the better in the present world depression.

Only France and the United States, representing less than 10 per cent of the world's population, are now holding out as bitter-enders for the survival of the archaic and destructive single gold standard. This stubbornness on the part of France and the United States is absolute folly. If, by any miracle, they should succeed in keeping alive the single gold standard, the only result would be a brief period of tolerable prosperity when we would again run into a so-called and wholly unnecessary cyclical depression as soon as world credits were increased to meet the needs of world commerce. If France and the United States shall persist in their struggle to maintain the single gold standard, and fail (as they will), they will only needlessly have prolonged our present agony and postponed world recovery.

Sir Archibald Alison tells us in his History of Europe that the demonetization of silver by Great Britain in 1816 added 50 per cent to the weight of debts and taxes; that small landed proprietors were ruined by the fall in prices; that distress was universal and seriously affected all branches of industry; that 160,000 landowners were reduced numerically in a few years to less than 30,000; and that 15 per cent of the population became objects of charity.

Sir Thomas Gresham, speaking of the same experiment, said:

"For every less sum owing a greater shall be paid; with the fall of prices farmers have no profits, the landlord no rent, the manufacturer no customers, and the laborer no employment."

The conditions so graphically described by Alison and Gresham have been exactly paralleled in the United States and the world the past three years, because of the artificially increased value of gold, due to its scarcity, its inadequacy, and its inefficient supply being locked up in legal reserves of central banks of issue.

What remedy do the great international single-gold-standard bankers of France and the United States propose? None, except to let the world sweat it out, till the world's pyramid of credit shall be reduced through defaults, cancellations, bankruptcies, receiverships, and failures, till it again becomes small enough to be supported for a time by their pitiful eleven billions of gold. What is their selfish object? It is to retain the world's credit concession on the small base of gold, so they can control it, even if the rest of us and the whole world must go bankrupt in the process. They appeal to our patriotism and generosity to support the unemployed and hungry while their selfish program is being carried out. They offer threadbare alibis to keep the people quiet, and ask us to grin and bear it. They ask us to wait. What for? Again, till the pyramid of credit has been still further reduced by more failures and more suffering to a point where it can be supported by gold alone. They tell us consolingly that the world has always emerged from past depressions, and will from this one, and expect us supinely to wait, wait, wait.

Why should the twenty hundred millions of people of the world longer kneel before a pitiable pot of eleven billions of gold, and regard it as something mystic or sacred, as the heathens of old worshiped their idols of clay? Through the hearts of these twenty hundred millions of people course the pulsating life blood of the human race, which was placed on this globe by Almighty God to progress and move ever onward. Why should the world have its happiness and progress obstructed by such an unnatural and purely artificial barrier, such a man-made device, such an impersonation of actual fraud and duress?

Even though the single gold standard may have been adopted originally in the best of faith, changed circumstances through the growth of world commerce, which could not be foreseen, and the further fact that the gold is now all locked up in legal reserves of central banks of issue, which could not have been foreseen, have made the present working of the single gold standard so oppressive, extortionate, and unconscionable as to amount to a legal fraud upon fair dealing. It is the law of every civilized nation that when an arrangement, although originally fair, ceases to be fair through changed circumstances not in the original contemplation of the parties the courts will not permit the party which is thus given the upper hand to take advantage of his wholly uncontemplated power to oppress the other. A great chancellor has said that in such a case no honest man would accept benefits from such an unforeseen change and that, therefore, no dishonest man will be permitted to do so.

The time has come for action. The United States Senate last February, without a dissenting vote, asked Mr. Hoover to call an international conference to reach an understanding on silver. Mr. Hoover has not done so, but echoes Wall Street and Paris in asking us to wait, wait, wait.

The present disparity between the price of gold exchange, due to the distorted price of the almost unobtainable gold, presents to the world a spectacle of stern reality more grotesque and hideous than was ever painted in fiction.

The miserable pot of less than eleven billions of monetary gold has sprung up as an evil giant and spread havoc throughout the world, while normally powerful nations, states, municipalities, and corporations have for the present become helpless dwarfs unable to function in a normal way.

Great cities of the United States, like Chicago, are unable to pay school-teachers and employees, and great States, like Tennessee, offer bonds to meet deficits and find no adequate bids. Many of the great cities and republics of Latin America and Europe, and many great municipalities and domestic corporations at home find themselves unable to buy gold exchange with their ordinary revenues with which to meet their pay rolls and maturing interest. The great Federal Government of the United States would be unable to pay all its employees and meet its maturing obligations except for its capacity to borrow more, and many less fortunate countries do not now have that capacity.

In the face of this unspeakable and wholly unnecessary world tragedy the international single-gold-standard bankers ask us to wait, wait, wait. They tell us that their deflation program must run its course. But their deflation program means inflation to the value of their gold and deflation only to the rest of the world. What they really mean is that as soon as our securities are all defaulted and wiped out they will again transfer some of the inflated value of their gold into the form of bonds and ask us to buy them with the products of our toil and labor, and to hold them until they shall find it necessary to deflate us again. But every time we are deflated the international single-gold-standard bankers are inflated, and in that way the world has become the stupid slave to a putrid pot of less than eleven billions of gold.

If Al Capone were out of jail, and he and his gang should capture all the gold there is and take it "for a ride" in a fleet of rum runners, and dump it in the deepest part of the Atlantic, where it could never be recovered, it would be a God's blessing in the present state of the world. Overnight the human race would find a better and more adequate medium of exchange to carry on its trade and commerce, and such an era of lasting prosperity and progress would be upon us as has not been seen since the morning stars first sang together.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1931

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We beseech Thee, O Lord our God, for that which we need. We pray Thee that Thou wilt grant that the cause of justice and peace may prevail among all nations. May all disturbances which tend to break into war be succumbed. May nation join nation until at last there shall be concord in all the earth. Send forth Thy light and drive farther and farther away the darkness of suffering and the tragedy of cruelty. We thank Thee, our Father, that Thou hast not sent upon us the frowns of anger, but Thou hast been revealed unto us as an all-loving Father through the Master of Sorrows. Within His realm there is warmth and hope and cheer and blessing. Breathe upon us, O Christ of God. Amen.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. J. Res. 39. Joint resolution extending the time within which the War Policies Commission is required to submit its final report.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. COUZENS and Mr. SMITH members of the Joint Select Committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Federal Radio Commission.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand some poetry on George Washington, recently composed by a distinguished educator who lives in my county and town. I think it will be a wonderful contribution to the bicentennial celebration.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD to include this poetry.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PERMISSION TO COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Ways and Means may have the privilege of being in session while the House is in session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question? I am not going to object.

Mr. COLLIER. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Can the gentleman give the House and the country any indication as to when he expects the moratorium resolution to come forward for the House to act upon?

Mr. COLLIER. I will be glad to do so. I have just dropped the moratorium resolution in the basket, and it is expected to hold hearings on that resolution before the Committee on Ways and Means at 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SNELL. When does the gentleman expect it to come on the floor of the House?

Mr. COLLIER. I hope we will be able to get it up on the floor of the House by Thursday.

Mr. RANKIN. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Mississippi mean that that is all the investigation which this question is going to receive before the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. COLLIER. I may say to my colleague from Mississippi that we expect to begin hearings to-morrow. If there is anyone who desires to be heard, he certainly will not be precluded from having a hearing. How long the hearings will continue I am unable to state definitely at this time. I have just stated to the gentleman from New York that my hope is that we may conclude the hearings in two days.

Mr. RANKIN. I, for one, should like very much to be heard.

Mr. COLLIER. The gentleman will certainly be given an opportunity.

Mr. RANKIN. I have a resolution that is now before the Rules Committee asking that we go into this thing thoroughly and investigate it thoroughly. My opinion is that when we do the moratorium resolution will never pass this House.

The facts developed relative to this so-called moratorium on foreign debts to the United States reveal one of the boldest schemes of financial buccaneering ever attempted against the unsuspecting people of the United States.

The international bankers who are behind this scheme have been telling the American people that unless this moratorium were granted our debtors would default on their payments. The truth is that these payments have already been made, or deposited in the New York banks, to be turned over to the American Government. Especially is that true as to England, France, and Italy. They are the only three nations involved to whom Germany owes anything. None of them asked for this moratorium. It has been contended that the object of it is to help Germany, indirectly, although Germany has recently loaned $800,000,000 to red Russia.

As to the other eight nations involved, none of whom asked for this moratorium, it is now shown that Germany does not owe them one cent. But they all do owe these international bankers who are back of this movement.

In his frantic efforts to pull the administration out of the hole in which it now finds itself, Ogden L. Mills, Wall Street's representative in the Treasury Department, says:

> There has never at any time been any intention of coupling the President's approval to re-create the World War Foreign Debt Commission with the proposal for a one year's suspension of payments on foreign debts.

Then why did he ask for the re-creation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission? There can be but one answer. It was to scale down, reduce, or cancel these foreign debts to the United States and unload the burden of paying them onto the American people.

This money, now deposited in New York to be turned over to the United States in settlement of these debt payments, will not be returned to Europe if this moratorium goes through. It will simply be transferred to these international bankers, who are urging Congress to act before it has ample time to investigate.

If the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate will take their time and investigate this question thoroughly in the light of these recent revelations, in my humble opinion, there will not be enough Members in either House to favor it to secure a roll call.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER]?

There was no objection.

MEMBERSHIP OF COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 54

Resolved, That during the Seventy-second Congress the Committees on the Judiciary, on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, on Agriculture, and on Rivers and Harbors shall each be composed of 23 members.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the President's message.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the President's message, with Mr. LOZIER in the chair.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL.]

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, if I were not jealous of the reputation of this body I would not detain you for even five minutes.

A speech was made on the floor of the House on Friday last which has had considerable publicity, and, I suppose, that was the purpose of the speech; but there was nothing constructive in the speech, and the only good feature was the apology which followed its delivery.

I shall pass over the complimentary reference to the lady Members of the House and the insult offered to the men of this House, or possibly to some charming old ladies, to whom we were compared; but I want to address myself particularly to the following, speaking of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]:

> He is not that type of a dry who goes to the wash room, takes a drink of liquor, and then goes back on the floor and votes dry. He is honest. There are a few of that type left.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has been a Member of this body sitting here for five legislative days. I do not recall that there were any wet or dry votes during that time, and yet the gentleman makes a statement of which he has no knowledge and which is a reflection on every Member of this House, wet or dry.

I ask the Members of the House, those who have been associated with me for the last 12 years, whether they know of instances where any of the Members retired to the cloakroom or retired to the wash room to take a drink before a vote was to be taken on any subject. He has designated each and every one of us either as toters of flasks or else intimated that there is a plentiful supply of liquor on hand in the wash room.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after he has been here as long as I have he will begin to appreciate that the men in the House are not as he designates them later, namely, hypocrites, but are honestly and earnestly backing the propositions which appeal to them. I have never heard a wet or a dry in this House impugn the integrity or honesty of any man on the other side of the question. [Applause.]

The greatest evil that has come from the eighteenth amendment is the defeat of many of our former Members, both wet and dry, whose services to their country were of the greatest value, and I deplore that feature of the eighteenth amendment more than all of the other evils it has brought, and the good it has done has been offset because the Nation has been deprived of the services of many very able statesmen.

I say that if this is allowed to go on, and the new Members of the House rise in their places and repeat the canards and falsehoods spread through the land by the sensational press, they will befoul their own nests and, furthermore, they will bring discredit upon this great body, which is the only constitutional body we have at present for the passing of our laws. [Applause.]

So, Mr. Chairman, more in sorrow than in anger, I chide this Member for rushing on the floor in his first five days of service, criticizing the Speaker for his inability to keep order, likening the Members to old women, and casting a reflection upon 90 per cent of the Members of this House, when he says they retire to the cloakroom before a vote is taken on a measure in order to fortify their courage with some of the Dutch product.

Mr. Chairman, it ill becomes a Member of this body to make any such statements when they are absolutely and entirely without foundation. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK]. [Applause.]

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman and my fellow Members of the committee, the course of last week's debate must be somewhat disconcerting to any thoughtful man. The wide variety of subjects that were discussed gave little indication of a unity of purpose, which should characterize the Congress of the United States in one of the gravest crises of all history, and, in the second place, the shadow boxing of political polemics, which also marked that debate, gave little ground for encouragement that in this supreme crisis of civilization there will be any disposition, such as there should be, to subordinate questions of mere party politics to the great task, to which, under the providence of God, this Nation seems to be destined in the critical years that are ahead of us.

If I may commence with some good-natured raillery, I would say that even from the standpoint of entertainment the debate also proved somewhat disappointing. I never saw such impenetrable gloom as fell upon the majority after the speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON]. The trouble was a lack of efficient stage management. If the distinguished leader of the majority, in staging his show, had consulted his colleague from New York [Mr. BLOOM], he would have known that in any well-regulated performance it is always desirable to commence in a lighter vein and then have a crescendo of interest until the great climax is sought to be attained. But in this case, with the first rising of the curtain, there was discovered the heavy tragedian of the Democratic Party. [Applause.] It was as though the play of Hamlet with the rising of the curtain disclosed the melancholy Dane and that the first words of the immortal tragedy were:

> The time is out of joint, oh cursed spite!
> That ever I was born to set it right.

Even Shakespeake's masterpiece could not have survived such "bad theater," to use a theatrical phrase. [Laughter and applause.]

Had our distinguished colleague, Mr. RAINEY, as the impresario, commenced with our witty colleague from New York [Mr. BLACK], and then as a preliminary to the rather tragical speech of Mr. HUDDLESTON had next brought on that admirable example of melodramatic politics, with which his colleague from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] entertained the House, then there would have been the preliminary ground for the final act of the show on that sad first day. Let me say as to the speech of Mr. HUDDLESTON, that if it were designed—and I hesitate to think it was so designed—as an appeal to class passion and to "play politics with human misery," then it was very admirably adapted to that purpose. That could be its only effect, however far it may have been from the purpose of the distinguished Representative from Alabama. It is therefore gratifying to know that when the next day I sought for the speech—which I only had heard in part—in the RECORD, I failed to find it, and day after day I looked for the full text of the magnum opus but in vain, until on Friday I found that either by the volition of the Member from Alabama or possibly by the wise counsel of his colleagues on the majority side, the speech had found its final resting place in that part of the RECORD, the Appendix, where it would be least likely to be read. That reminds me of a story. When King Edward had an operation for appendicitis—and at his time of life the operation was fraught with danger—and when the crisis was successfully passed, there were thanksgiving services in nearly every church in England, and in one of them the pastor, desiring to announce a hymn that by a chance had been printed in the supplement to the hymn book, announced it in this way, "We will now sing 'Peace, Perfect Peace,' in the appendix." [Laughter.] And thus this fiery appeal, as it must inevitably be regarded, to class passion has had its perfect peace in the Appendix, and there may it rest forever. [Laughter.]

In a very different spirit than that of mere partisanship the present Congress should approach its grave duties. This Congress will be one of the most critical in the history of our Government. It approaches far graver tasks than those with which many previous sessions of this body have been confronted.

If 75 years from now an historian attempted to view in retrospect the first 2,000 years of Christian history, I think he would say that it was characterized by four major catastrophies that dwarf all others. The first, the fall of the Roman Empire, which required eight centuries before Europe was again restored to an appearance of stability and order. The second was the Thirty Years' War, which required a full century before civilization was again enabled to resume its normal functions. The third, the period of the Napoleonic wars, lasted some 20 years, and although we sometimes think that Europe was quickly restored, as a matter of fact it was more than a half century before there was any normalcy, to use President Harding's phrase, in Europe. As a matter of fact, following the Napoleonic wars came the revolutions of 1830 that swept through Europe, and the far greater upheaval of 1848.

The fourth of these major catastrophies since the birth of Christ is the World War with the attendant crisis through which civilization is now passing. The present economic collapse is the inevitable aftermath of the greatest war in history. In its implications upon all forms of government it is more serious than the World War itself.

The World War was a majestic struggle, physical and moral, between great nations, but this economic crisis is a deadly paralysis that is attacking all civilization, and the end of it no one can safely predict.

Certainly, with nations dissolving in disorder and ruin, with 18 nations having defaulted upon their national obligations, with 15 nations abandoning the gold standard, with the fires of revolution springing up everywhere, so that revolution succeeds revolution, almost treading upon each other's heels, it can not be gravely questioned by any thinking man that the world at the moment is in a far graver condition than it was when Europe shook under the thunder of millions of men in the terrible years of 1914–1918.

The thought that it seems to me should be uppermost in the minds of the Congress is that the one Nation that can possibly stabilize—and it will be the work of many years—a distracted and disorganized civilization is our own.

If we can not afford hope to the world, then, seemingly, there is no hope.

We were, in our great epic beginnings, in a sense the liberator of mankind, in that we gave those liberal ideas which, until the World War, so largely influenced the affairs of men. We were in a sense the pacificator of the world when we put out in 1918, by the valor of our armies, the mighty conflagration which threatened to destroy all Europe; but now a far graver task awaits us—that of being something more than either liberator or pacificator. The task awaits us that by wise statesmanship, unless western civilization is to perish, we must do our part in stabilizing a completely disorganized economic civilization.

I remember once talking with Lloyd George, and he made a remark to me that I shall never forget. He said, "Mr. BECK, Europe could have stood three years of the war and recovered. The fourth year was fatal." And it may be that the future will vindicate that rather tragic prophecy of that statesman who, if he is not always profound, has yet a very brilliant and acute intellect; at all events, it is a serious question whether or not western civilization, so far at least as it is represented by that European civilization of which we are a part, although a distant part, will survive the tragic consequences of the greatest war in history.

This leads me to a question, to which I challenge the very earnest consideration of the House: How is the United States to render the great part which, apparently, the God of nations intended it to play in this great crisis? We can do so, in my judgment, only if in the matter of foreign affairs we stand by the President. Please observe that I say "the President," and I am saying this as a friendly admonition to the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the aisle. You have a confidence, and it may be a confidence justified under present conditions, that the next President of the United States will be of your party. A great deal may happen between now and the ides of November, and I will not put my speech on a political plane by discussing how far your confidence is justified or otherwise; but I do agree, and I think it is an undoubted fact, that your party has to-day a possibility of electing the next President, which everyone must take into consideration. Therefore my plea is not for the present President of the United States, but for the President of the United States, whether he be as now a Republican or in a few years from now a Democrat. There can be no real influence of America in world affairs unless in the matter of international relations there be a generous support of the President of the United States, whether Republican or Democrat, in that which he sees fit to do in attempting to have this country play its destined part in international relations upon this wide and universal theater of man.

That is quite in accord with our constitutional form of government.

I was somewhat surprised that so eminent a lawyer as my friend from Texas, Judge SUMNERS, should have raised this question of constitutional power in his speech of last Friday, and while I am not going to discuss that at any length, because I understand my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] intends to reply to the soundness of Judge SUMNER'S argument, I want very briefly to suggest to the House this fact in American history. Prior to the Constitution of the United States there was no Executive, and all foreign relations were the exclusive prerogative of the Continental Congress, and, as a result, we had easily the worst conduct of foreign relations in our history, and all that saved this country from pitiful disaster in its War for Independence was the fact that we had in Paris a wise and great statesman and diplomat in the person of Benjamin Franklin. Without Franklin our foreign policy would have been one of extreme ineptitude and folly. That was recognized by the framers of the Constitution, and while in the Constitution they said little textually with respect to the powers of the President in foreign affairs, yet when they said, not merely that he should negotiate treaties by and with the consent of the Senate, not only that he was to appoint our ambassadors and receive foreign ambassadors and ministers, and thus be the appropriate organ of communication with foreign lands, but, far more, when the Constitution vested the "Executive power" in a President of the United States it conferred a great power.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BECK. I would gladly be interrupted a little later, if the gentleman will pardon me, for if I once lose the thread of what I am saying, I might find difficulty in picking it up again. I don't want to be discourteous to the gentleman.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Oh, not at all.

Mr. BECK. I would rather not yield at present.

The Executive power was the biggest grant of power in two words in all the Constitution, and it can only be explained by reference to the Executive power as it existed at that time. At all events, from the very beginning of the country, the practical interpretation of the Constitution—for the Constitution itself was but a working plan, the superstructure of which successive generations had to build on the ground plan of the great architects—the practical construction of the Constitution has been that, subject only to the clause that a treaty which permanently commits the Unted States to a policy must have the consent of two-thirds of the Senate, and that no war can be declared unless the whole Congress shall support such a declaration—with those exceptions the practical administration of the Government has been, and wisely been, that the President, by virtue of the executive power, is the appropriate organ to confer with foreign nations governing their relations with us. Washington himself set the precedent, because when the Jay treaty came back to America and there was a storm of dissent, Washington was asked by this House to submit to it all the communications that had passed between him and the British Government, and Washington, in a message to this House, which I have not the time to read, but which I shall venture to incorporate in my remarks, made, as I recall, the one reference that he ever made to his great participancy in the Constitutional Convention, and said in substance that he declined to submit such papers, as he knew, as a member of the Constitutional Convention, that the executive power clothed the President with the power to negotiate and conduct our foreign relations.

He said in this message of March 30, 1796:

* * * Having been a member of the general convention and knowing the principles on which the Constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject; and from the first establishment of the Government to this moment my conduct has exemplified that opinion—that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and that every treaty so made and promulgated thenceforward became the law of the land. It is thus that the treaty-making power has been understood by foreign nations, and in all the treaties made with them we have declared and they have believed that, when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, they become obligatory. In this construction of the Constitution every House of Representatives has heretofore acquiesced, and until the present time not a doubt or suspicion has appeared, to my knowledge, that this construction was not the true one. Nay, they have more than acquiesced; for till now, without controverting the obligation of such treaties, they have made all the requisite provisions for carrying them into effect.

He concluded:

As, therefore, it is perfectly clear to my understanding that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty, as the treaty with Great Britain exhibits in itself all the objects requiring legislative provision, and on these the papers called for can throw no light, and as it is essential to the due administration of the Government that the boundaries fixed by the Constitution between the different departments should be preserved, a just regard to the Constitution and to the duty of my office, under all the circumstances of this case, forbids a compliance with your request.

His right to refuse to submit his confidential negotiations with foreign nations assumed his right to conduct them. It is a very interesting fact, and one that we may have occasion to remember hereafter, if we do not now support the President in his attempt to extricate America and, indeed, all civilization from the morass of disaster in which it now finds itself, that when the American people at first distrusted any President in his conduct of foreign relations, they afterwards found in most instances that the President was right, and that they in their temporary opinion with only partial knowledge of affairs, were wrong. The Jay treaty came back to America, and a perfect storm of dissent was raised, and it is humiliating to me to recall that in my own city of Philadelphia a thousand men hooted George Washington to his dwelling place because of his espousal of the Jay treaty. Yet when the storm had passed away the surpassing wisdom of the Jay treaty in saving our country from a war with England in our infancy was beyond any question.

Again, when Jefferson acquired Louisiana, he told his commissioner to buy it for $15,000,000, and there was then a storm of dissent, not merely as to the policy of taking that great trans-Mississippi region but also as to the power of the President to negotiate for the purchase, and yet the gentlemen on the Democratic side, who represent great sovereign States that were carved out of the Louisiana Purchase, must recognize to-day that Jefferson, in what was a crisis for continental America, was right. When France would not pay the French spoliation claims, Jackson issued a declaration so aggressive and militant that its only justification was the unwillingness of France to pay what she had agreed to pay. France withdrew her ambassador, and we in turn dismissed her ambassador; but when the storm had died down again the policy of the President had its ample vindication in final results. France paid.

Lincoln was criticized and his policy doubted when he acquiesced in the return of Mason and Slidell to the British Government, and yet we know now that but for the wisdom of Lincoln overruling Seward we might have found ourselves in a serious situation. Let it also not be forgotten that one factor in the peaceful solution of this controversy was the forebearance and generosity of the Prince Consort of England, whose dying act was to prevent such a message from Lord John Russell as would have inevitably meant a war with the Union at a time when we were incapable of defending ourselves because we were in the midst of a civil war. The wisdom of Lincoln was again justified.

Perhaps one thought may have arisen in the minds of the gentlemen on the majority side of the aisle. They will say, "Did the Republican Members of Congress support Mr. Wilson in the matter of the League of Nations?" That is a fair challenge. Let me, therefore, briefly speak upon that point. There were many of us, and I was one, who did question the policy of Mr. Wilson during the two and one-half years when he was committed to a policy of neutrality. I believed then, and I believe now, that had we gone into the war after the sinking of the Lusitania, not only would we have saved civilization but we would have saved many human lives and an immense loss of property, because at that time Russia had not crumbled, and our entry into the war would have been the beginning of the end. But from the moment that President Wilson gave to the Congress of the United States his immortal declaration of purpose to declare war there never was among the Republican Members of Congress the slightest hesitation, but in the most ungrudging way, as testimony was given in the debate last week, we supported the President to the limit. [Applause.] If it be to the immortal glory of Woodrow Wilson that he led this country successfully into the greatest war in history, and proved its determining factor, he would be grudging, indeed, and wanting in generosity if he did not recognize the cordial cooperation of the Republican Party. Then all were for the state and none for party.

Two things unhappily followed. First, our reward was for President Wilson, when there was this moratorium on politics, to issue a call demanding the return of a Democratic Congress; and we would have taken the blow on both cheeks if, with such challenge to party spirit at the very time when we had subordinated party spirit, we had not taken up the challenge.

But even then we supported the President in every war measure until his proposal to implicate us permanently in the entangling relations of Europe by participation in the League of Nations. Let it not be forgotten that when he attempted that he not only knew that more than one-third of the Senate had said they would never consent to such a treaty, but when he came back from Paris and made his first speech in this country he arrogantly said to the American people and the Congress of the United States that he had so interwoven the League of Nations covenant with the peace treaty that we no longer had any power of opposition or resistance and had to take his proposal that we should be a permanent part of European politics, because the only alternative was a continuance of the war. Nevertheless, we did not support the President in the matter of the League of Nations. There were many patriotic Democrats who supported us in that stand, and certainly the people of the country sustained the Republican Party by an overwhelming majority. Their decision was a just one, for the last 11 years have indubitably shown that America can play a far greater, a more beneficent part in the tangled affairs of civilization by remaining outside of the League of Nations and as each recurring crisis arrives decide what it can do as its contribution to civilization than if she had sent a representative to Geneva and asked that the faith and power and credit of the United States should be compromised by every little quarrel that might arise. [Applause.]

All of our history has demonstrated the practical wisdom of our recognizing that the President, in matters of foreign affairs, has a peculiar function, and that without that function there could be no unity in the foreign policy of the Government, and that without such unity of purpose our ship of state would drift upon the great ocean of world politics without chart or compass.

Some of you may recall from more than one of my modest addresses on the floor of this House that I have never been one of those who believed in the aggrandizement of the President. I have at times differed from him in some of his domestic policies. I believe there has been an unhealthy accretion of power in the Executive under the administrations of both parties. In the matter of domestic policies it is not only our privilege to differ with him, but it is our solemn duty, because the Constitution made the Congress of the United States the great council of the Republic. [Applause.] We determine the policies of the Nation with respect to internal affairs and we determine the methods by which such policies shall be carried out, and the President is but the first servant of the state in executing the will of Congress. But it is not so with foreign affairs, except to the extent I have indicated, that a treaty must be ratified by the Senate and that only war can be declared by Congress. With that exception, if the Republic is to play the part that George Washington intended, if it is to afford to all mankind, using the words of his farewell address, "the great and too novel experiment of a nation always guided by exalted benevolence and justice," whether the original text of the Constitution expressly so provides in words or not, there must be an institutional policy of the Congress that in matters of foreign affairs it will support the President of the United States, except where there may be some question of fundamental importance which would affect the whole form and character of our Government.

Mr. PURNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BECK. I am like a man trying to jump over a hill. I have taken too much time in the preliminary run, because I want to apply that which I have been saying in general to the question of the debts. Of course, that is the particular application of the moment, but I am afraid I shall have too little time and possibly must ask some further occasion adequately to express my views on that serious question. To make the application briefly, to be expanded later, we are told that when the President of the United States, having informally taken the judgment of a large majority of the Senate and the House, proposed a moratorium for one short, fleeting year—and that moratorium of such importance that if it had not been granted, there would have been a crash in the financial world that would have overwhelmed not merely the peoples of Europe but the people of this country in far worse disaster than it is in even now—I say to charge that when he did that he in some way was wanting in due recognition of the limitations and functions of his great office is incorrect, and I deny it.

How could the President, in view of the economic crisis that was presented to him, do otherwise than confer with foreign powers to see whether they would be disposed to temporarily forbear pressing their debtors if we showed a like forbearance to them? He said it was to be subject to the approval of Congress, and maybe technically he was required to do so; but the fact remains that with scrupulous regard for the constitutional proprieties he proposed the moratorium, and his wise action is now assailed.

In doing so, undoubtedly, he was only proposing a temporary palliative. In the beginning of my speech I considered, with design, the long periods of time that were requisite to recover from the three great preceding catastrophes of civilization, because, in my judgment, the man is not living in this Chamber who will see the ultimate results of the economic crisis which the destructive World War has inflicted upon humanity. Therefore, we must build ahead and must consider what can be done to lift the cloud from the economic world and pull civilization out of its present rut.

I am not in favor of canceling the debts. I think it would be unwise, from the standpoint of international credit in the indefinite future, for us to formally cancel the debts. I am not aware that our debtor nations have in any official way asked us to do so. But there is a vast difference between the canceling of debts and forbearing to press them when your debtor is in a condition of absolute helplessness in the matter of payment. Therefore, we adopted a policy worthy of President Wilson's peace policy, and it was one of the finest points of his foreign policy that at the treaty of Versailles he refused to take one inch of soil from the conquered nations or to participate in the somewhat ignoble division of territorial spoils. Following that policy, which did him and his Nation infinite credit, we adopted in the succeeding administration the policy that the debts due us should be paid to the extent of the capacity of the nations to pay.

Who is going to determine that capacity? This Congress? What facilities has it to do so? It has none. If it decided it, could it do it with any reasonable unity of purpose?

Assuming that the Congress is not bound under the Constitution by the President's action in this particular international relation, yet nevertheless the wise policy of our country is to give to him a very generous and broad discretion in determining what is, after all, a matter of detail, the question of a temporary forbearance in the payment of these debts.

We will hear a great deal on this subject, and much bitter language has already been uttered and much more bitter is probably to follow, but nevertheless let us remember this, that America can not fulfill its manifest duty unless we stand by the President. I do not know whether President Coolidge ever said it; I do not believe he did, although it was imputed to him; but he is quoted as once saying of the debt problem:

> Well, they hired the money, did they not?

Yes; they hired the money, but that is no answer. Shylock, when challenged on the validity of his bond, could have said as much to Antonio.

So it is not a question of the legal obligation of debtor nations to pay but of their moral obligation to pay if they are unable to pay, because you can not get blood out of a stone, and with nations whose industries are disorganized, whose wheels of trade are hopelessly stuck in the mire, to take a harsh and repellant attitude toward those nations would reflect, in my judgment, lasting discredit upon this country and would be quite unworthy of that generous policy of President Wilson, to which I have already referred in the matter of territorial division of Germany's colonies. But it will be said, and I hope you will give me time for this final thought, why, all this final talk of forbearance is for the benefit of the international bankers, and we will probably have the changes rung on this subject throughout the session.

Let me tell you, what in my judgment, the situation is in respect to that. There are three classes of international bankers, so called.

The first class were wise and far-seeing men who after the end of the World War perceived that the only thing that would save the economic structure of European civilization was a transfusion of blood in the form of credit. It was exhausted, prostrate, bleeding, and almost dying. We had banks overflowing with money, and therefore these bankers did make many investments which, probably, to-day they may regret, to infuse new credit into the veins of what otherwise might prove to be a dying civilization. This is to their credit, even if it proves but another contribution of America to the salvation of the world.

In the second place, there are a number of so-called international bankers whose vision does not go much beyond the Bronx and who, with a mad idea of reaping high-interest rates, did peddle the moneys of the United States in every part of Europe, without discrimination or reason. These were generally the great banks of our leading cities, and they believed in good faith that they were acting for the advantage and profit of the stockholders of their banks and, generally, the commercial interests of the country. There was, however, a third class of private bankers who floated these foreign loans with no higher thought than the one to obtain the banker's commission and to float the securities upon the country. They have a very heavy responsibility. Some of them may have erred more in ignorance than in cunning. Some of them erred in cunning, and these adventurers, who had no higher motive than ignoble gain, are the third and least defensible class.

I can mention one international banking house, and lest I be misunderstood, it is not at Broad and Wall—that to my knowledge went through Europe literally forcing, and when I say forcing I mean pushing as one pushes a marked card, loans upon municipalities and corporations in Germany, with no thought of the future and with absolute indifference as to who should bear the loss if Germany should collapse.

These international bankers, whether they acted wisely or unwisely, whether they acted selfishly or unselfishly, represent billions of dollars that are now in the possession of the American people. If you destroy Germany's ability to repay, you will not hurt them half as much as banks, large and small, throughout the Nation, which have these securities to the tune of many billions of dollars.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BECK. At all events, whatever the merits or the demerits of these international bankers may have been—and how could our economic machinery function without international bankers—the fact remains, and I invite the attention of the majority of the House to it, that if this House by failure to support the President, as he attempts to pull some order out of chaos, destroys the ability either of foreign governments to pay us, when possible, their obligations, and also their minor governmental entities, like cities and business enterprises to pay us, you will have inflicted a disaster upon America to which the present crisis will compare as a spring zephyr to a cyclonic storm on the plains of Nebraska.

You can not ruin the so-called international banks without bringing irretrievable disaster upon the whole body of the American people, because we are so interlinked, economically, with banking and railroad and other instrumentalities of commerce, that if you strike a blow in one place, it will be felt from the crown of the head to the foot. Therefore you can not simply dismiss the matter by saying, "Let the international bankers take care of themselves." It is all part of one problem the national debt due us, the debts owed by business corporations and municipal subdivisions of those foreign nations to us, and all of it must be worked out in order that credit may be restored, and if credit is to be restored, it must be restored in Europe before it can ever be really restored here, because, whether we like it or not, we are a part of a situation world-wide in extent and beyond the power of any one nation to solve.

I am one of those who believe that it may become the part of wisdom, but this we must leave to the sound discretion of the President, whether he be a Republican or a Democrat, to adjust both Government and non-Government debts in a manner that will inflict the least loss to investors and more quickly and effectually restore the prosperity of the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the radio speech which the gentleman is to make to-night, and to which we all expect to listen with interest, to be made on the subject of supporting the President?

Mr. BECK. No.

Mr. BLANTON. I understood that the gentleman was to speak to-night in behalf of the American Taxpayers' League or under its auspices.

Mr. BECK. That is right.

Mr. BLANTON. Are the subjects interrelated?

Mr. BECK. No; there is no connection between what I shall say to-night and what I am trying, ineffectually, to say here.

Mr. BLANTON. But the question of standing by the President in this instance does relate to taxation.

Mr. BECK. Oh, no, no.

Mr. BLANTON. That must follow as a corollary.

Mr. BECK. Not at all. The question of taxation is one of the domestic problems of the United States, but I beg my friend not to interrupt me further.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not anticipate the gentleman's speech to-night. But later I shall have something to say about the American Taxpayers' League. If money now due us is not paid, it is only by taxation that we can get money to replace it.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I have already trespassed far too long upon the patience of the House, and in conclusion I shall say only this, that in this matter—not of canceling debt but of forbearing to press the nations that are prostrate—it is well for us to remember that the "quality of mercy is not strained." There can not be any adequate solution except by acting through the one appropriate organ that the Constitution of the United States provides. If we fail to support the President, political chaos will inevitably result and the economic structure of civilization may fall into cureless ruin. If the President of the United States, with his knowledge as President of conditions in Europe—and I am not referring to him personally but to the exceptional knowledge which any President has and which Congress can not have—pulls one way and we pull another, and we deny to him that just and generous discretion in the arduous and almost impossible task that confronts him and will confront his successor, then the world will regard this Nation as having little of that unity of purpose or that effectiveness that is proportioned to the magnitude of its potential resources. So I plead with you, let us subordinate politics in this matter of international relations. Let the best men of both parties say to the President, this hard-working President, who in this crisis has given his all and his best to his country, We will stand by you. He may not do the wise thing at the moment, but at least he is entitled to feel that he has the united country behind him. [Applause on Republican side.]

If he has such support, I am so convinced of the great prestige of the United States that I believe, as far as I can see into the future, whether it be 5 or 25 or 50 years, that the United States will add to all of its immeasurable contributions to the welfare of mankind the supreme glory of having found the world in a state of wreckage and of having lifted it from that wreckage to that former plane of prosperity and well-being that preceded the World War. Ah—

> The quality of mercy is not strained;
> It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
> Upon the place beneath: it is twice bless'd;
> It blesseth him that gives and him that takes:
> 'Tis mightiest in the mightiest; it becomes
> The throned monarch better than his crown;
> His sceptre shows the force of temporal power,
> The attribute to awe and majesty,
> Wherein doth sit the dread and fear of kings;
> But mercy is above this sceptred sway;
> It is enthroned in the hearts of kings,
> It is an attribute to God himself.

I have quoted Shakespeare, but let me remind you of a parable which a greater Teacher once spoke, in which he likened the Kingdom of Heaven to a certain king who would take account of his servants. One was brought who owed him 10,000 talents who had not wherewith to pay, but who, falling on his knees, besought the mercy of his lord. Whereupon the king, moved by pity, forgave him the debt. But this same servant went out and found one of his fellow servants who owed him a hundred pence and, laying hands on him, demanded payment of the debt. His fellow servant fell at his feet, beseeching mercy, for he could not pay. But the first servant would not be patient, and cast his fellow servant into prison until he should pay the debt. But when the lord saw this deed he called the servant before him.

> Then his lord, after that he had called him, said unto him "O thou wicked servant, I forgave thee all that debt, because thou desiredst me:
> Shouldest not thou also have had compassion on thy fellow servant, even as I had pity on thee?"
> And his lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentors

And if we are true to the God of nations and the God whose providential powers have been so manifested in our own history, then we will subordinate all questions of party advantage or consideration and as one man we will fall behind the President as the leader of America in international affairs and hold up his hands in his attempt to restore a nearly destroyed civilization. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I did promise to answer a question of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am going to have two minutes of my own time, and so I will not want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania the question I had in mind.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] has indicated that some gentleman from Massachusetts is to reply to my remarks of Friday last. At this time I shall take only a couple of minutes. May I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I agree, of course, as we all do, that it is the business of the President to negotiate treaties. The answer then on that point is that this is not a treaty being considered now, otherwise the matter would not now be considered in the House. I agree with him that we ought to follow the President in all matters having to do with Executive responsibility. My reply to that observation is that the Congress of the United States has definitely declared its position in regard to these foreign debts, and by that declaration fixed the duties of the President with regard to these debts. He is the Executive but not the Government. If the President, any President, decides that to execute the will of the Congress, as expressed, would be hurtful, his duty is clear and his power ample to submit his views to Congress, take its judgment afresh, and if the Congress agree with the President, he can then proceed constitutionally in harmony with the plan and the common sense of our system of government. [Applause on Democratic side.]

I agree with the gentleman that we should support the President in his field of responsibility, and I agree that we should not be petty with regard to incidental crossings over the line. I agree that we ought not to quarrel with the President unless something fundamental is involved, but I say that when you come to deal with the revenues of a country, you are dealing with the most fundamental thing in government. He who controls the purse strings of a nation controls the nation. The wisdom of the ages has shown that it is not a proper privilege or prerogative or power of an executive. That is settled. It is so fixed in our constitutional system. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says he does not favor extending by encroachment the power of the Executive. I agree with the gentleman. I am not in favor of extending it and the public revenue either by encroachment of the Executive or by surrender of the Congress. It will not do. Experience in government has demonstrated the danger. We are not dealing with theories, we are disregarding the instruction of experience. Instead of letting this go along and establish a precedent, thus adding to further abuse, it is the solemn duty of the legislative branch of the Government to support, sustain, and defend and to hold to itself as trustee for the generations to come those constitutional powers and prerogatives which the framers of the Constitution lodged here and not with the President of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I was deeply impressed with the histrionic manner of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], who started out with the fall of the Roman Empire and wound up with the destruction of Europe, unless we agree to the moratorioum. I shall not get into a controversy with him as to whether the fall of the Roman Empire was one of the four great catastrophes of the world, because we could spend weeks in debate here as to when it fell and where it lit, and all that sort of thing.

Let us not get mixed up on that kind of thing. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has gone back too far in order to get the soup, as the Irishman said when they offered him oxtail soup.

The gentleman said there was a pall of gloom settled over the faces of the Members on the Democratic side of the House after the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] made his speech the other day. After the brilliant portrayal of the desperate condition of the country, of the desperate condition of nearly 10 per cent of this country being without work and without resources, and of the desperate condition of the agricultural interests and business interests of this country after 11 years of Republican rule, it was a gloom which the Democrats naturally felt, in sympathy for this country when it remembered that it had to have at least another year of that same rule. [Applause.]

The matter that gave us gloom was that matter.

Now, I want to disabuse the mind of anyone who may have any doubt about my position on this moratorium. It is already granted, and in conformity with my judgment of what was best to be done, when I was asked whether I would support it or not in June, it looked to me as though it was the proper thing to say to the President, "We will back you. You use your best judgment." And I am doing so. There is no question about my loyalty to my party when I say that I expect to vote for it. Therefore I am not to be considered as one of those who is baiting the President.

My friend from Pennsylvania also very artfully brought in the fact that President Wilson in 1918, although he had adjourned politics, asked for a Democratic House. I may remind the gentleman that in that same communication one Herbert Hoover joined. So if it was treason in President Wilson it was treason in the present President of the United States. [Applause.]

He not only did that, but he supported this heresy known as the League of Nations. Mr. Hoover was in favor of that. So we are not so far apart.

But I want to talk about some practical things. Did you know that the farms of this country are being sold every day by the institutions established by this Government and people are being driven from their homes because they are unable to make the payments that are required of them? We should do something for these people when it comes to moratoria, and I am in favor of doing something for them.

I want to know if my friends on the minority side are likewise in favor of doing something for them.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield.

Mr. STEAGALL. I might add in that connection that the farmers of this country are standing by their contracts and undertaking to pay all they ever contracted to pay, and they have never asked for any reduction. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes. They are not asking to have it cut to 50 per cent. The farmers are entitled to some consideration as well as the Dutchmen and the Frenchmen and the Englishmen. Now, they propose to do it. We have bills before us already, coming from the administration, and they propose to create two or three more great boards at $12,000 a year, appointed by the President, to function as the Federal Farm Board has functioned and the Federal farm land banks have functioned, and all the other boards and commissions, exercising all of their authority and forgetting the man who is being sold out, when it comes to the crucial date, in front of the courthouse door. Why, gentlemen, talk about the farm business! My friend from Kansas said the other day it was because we had overproduction. If the President of the United States would require all the commissions he has appointed on everything, from the commission on Haiti up to date, to eat American wheat bread, they would have eaten the surplus before this time. [Laughter.] If he had required all of them to wear cotton underclothes, including cotton nightshirts, the cotton surplus would have been gone before this time. They would have done a great deal more good than they have done by any of their other performances. But I say to you that this matter of the appointment of boards is one which is becoming nauseous to the people of the United States, because they see so many people elevated into positions of power and trust who do not carry out their trusts. For instance, take the Federal Farm Board that was created and appointed by the President. I do not say that the law is not all right. I voted for it. But the board that was appointed was a set of incompetents, and I do not hesitate to say so.

Ladies and gentlemen, when it developed that we were going to make a big crop of cotton, their advice was to plow up and destroy every third row of cotton. I could take that board and the evidence of their operations about this question of surplus before a jury of the District of Columbia and I could get a verdict committing them to St. Elizabeths as being incompetent if the jury reflected its proper and normal conclusions. [Applause.]

That is the kind of boards we have got, and now we are offered more of them to help the people some more. I am in favor of helping the folks, but I want to know something about who is going to administer the laws this time.

Again, take the wheat business. When MrKelvie from Nebraska, who had never grown a bushel of wheat, who was one of these newspaper wheat editors, was appointed; he put all the money, or a great deal of it, into cooperatives with which he had been connected. They rigged up a lot of cooperatives to compete with the farmers' cooperatives, and instead of producer-owned cooperatives handling the wheat situation, the newspaper farmers with their cooperatives handled it, and the thing has been a complete debacle.

The other day my friend, Mr. STRONG of Kansas, talked about the tariff on wheat and the tariff we must have on it. Why, gentlemen, as a matter of fact, under the administration of this beneficent Farm Board, wheat is sold for less than the tariff on it. If you had brought a bushel of wheat in here from Canada at times you would have had to sell the wheat and pay 10 cents more on account of the tariff on it. That is what you would have done. That is the kind of a board we are getting, and the farmer has been getting it in the neck.

I submit this to you: I think we need some legislation that will amount to something, that will give some relief, that will give a little moratorium to the fellow who is tied up, who has put up everything he has and is about to be sold out. We should do all of that before we begin to give a moratorium to Europe, and I am in favor of it.

Well, you say, what is the matter with the farmer? What is the matter with the whole country? Why, the matter is this: The people in foreign countries can not buy from us. Why can they not buy? It is because all of the gold has flowed here, and that was all they could buy with.

My friend said he would like to know what the tariff has to do with the farmer.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The tariff is such that the Chinaman and the Indian, 700,000,000 of them, in buying our products can not pay us with their goods. They can not buy our goods because they can not pay us with their goods. Their silver has gone down to about one-third what it was, and when they go to buy exchange in dollars it takes three times as much silver now as it did two years ago, and they can not buy our stuff because they can not afford to pay three prices in their money for what they buy and what they use. The result is they can not buy. Their gold has already come here and it is concentrated. The same thing applies to Europe very largely. When an English merchant buys a bill of goods from New York and wants to pay for the goods he can only get $3.75 for his pound where it used to be worth $4.86. That increases the cost of his goods to such an extent that he does not buy from us and he can not. It is the same with all of Europe. For that reason they are not buying our stuff and they will never be able to do it so long as that discrepancy exists. The farmers who produce and those who convert his products into articles of manufacture can not sell their goods. They can not sell the manufactured articles nor can they sell the raw products abroad. The result is we are confronted with a condition that is unspeakable and has become more so for the last eight or nine years.

Oh, our friends say it is a world condition. Well, I will guarantee that if Al Smith had been elected President of the United States and he was in the White House now these fellows would say it is Al Smith and not a world condition. That is the answer to them. But it is a world condition and it is superinduced by the inability of the other peoples of the world to buy our goods, and much of that condition has been brought about by reason of the tariff that has been put upon us. Another thing is the concentration of gold here, and that is indirectly the result of the tariff. The concentration of gold here and in France has deprived the balance of the world of the basic money upon which to issue their currency. What is the result? They either have to contract their currency or have currency out that is not good, that does not stand for par, that is depleted to the extent that it is not receivable in foreign countries except at a very low rate. That again brings about an inability to buy our products and do anything to relieve our conditions here.

So I say we are not to be considered as bolsheviks of we ask Mr. Hoover for some reason as to why he has granted this moratorium. So far as I am concerned, I am satisfied with the reasons, but it is not right to accuse a person of being a bolshevik if he rises and says no President can pledge away the money of the United States without the consent of Congress.

They talk about the Louisiana Purchase. My friend over there had a descending climax, to a certain extent. He started out with George Washington, then Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, and Abraham Lincoln, and he wound up with Mr. Hoover. That was a sort of anticlimax to me. I will not contradict the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a scholar. He knows more Shakespeare than I know about the Bible and all that kind of thing, but when he is so indiscreet as to undertake to set up in a row Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, and Herbert Hoover, he makes an anticlimax and he makes the President look exceedingly small in this House and country. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, after the failure of the Geneva naval conference, 1927, the tension between the United States and Great Britain increased. The situation was further endangered by the 31-ship bill which was passed by the House but failed in the Senate. The British, as a gesture, delayed the building of two cruisers already authorized. During this period of tension the British-French naval negotiations, which were completely misunderstood in this country, increased the extreme anti-British feeling.

Thus, until Ambassador Gibson's speech at the preparatory disarmament conference in April, presenting President Hoover's determination to bring about genuine reduction and lift the burdens from the war-weary nations, political expediency could not be reconciled with armaments, compatible with security. Europe, thinking in terms of the next war, still remained more or less an armed camp, with a larger trained military personnel and reserves than obtained when the World War broke. Naval programs called for the expenditure of billions of dollars.

The United States attitude, as evidenced by the Gibson speech and the Briand-Kellogg pact, changed this whole situation. Premier MacDonald, of Great Britain, let it be known that he would welcome an invitation from the United States to visit this country. President Hoover immediately invited him.

The visit of Mr. MacDonald, besides making a misunderstanding impossible between the two Nations, was a symbol of the new preeminence of the United States in world affairs. It also was a tribute to Great Britain, as the President had held informal conversations with the head of the nation most deeply concerned about the race in armaments. Directly out of the visit came the London Naval Conference of 1930. No one doubts the wisdom of President Hoover in issuing this invitation, the outcome of which has contributed so directly to the better understanding between nations.

Yet the favorable impression created by the MacDonald record and personality in this country was not shared by all the European countries. France exhibited considerable irritation, refused to regard the visit as a new step toward naval and general limitation of armaments, but as a move in the British desire for an Anglo-American entente, thus enabling the British Labor Party to carry out a policy of breaking loose from continental Europe. France professed to believe that the MacDonald visit was directed against some one rather than a mission to obtain mutual understanding and concerted action in regard to certain international problems.

Mr. Hoover having been so highly successful in his first great international undertaking as President of the United States again entered the international arena by proposing a year's moratorium on intergovernmental debts and reparations.

The British Government first sensed the approaching collapse of the finances of Germany with the resultant effect on international finance. American financiers realized the dangers to this country. The President of the United States, realizing the seriousness of the situation, proposed, on June 20, 1931, a year's moratorium on intergovernmental debts and reparations. Not until July 6, however, was it possible for him to announce that accord had been reached with all important creditor nations.

In the interval what had happened? France, conscious of having won the World War and with a truly pre-war lack of cooperation, protested against the Hoover plan. The delay was fatal to Germany. Almost immediately Great Britain, having made extensive loans to Germany, betrayed financial weakness. Manipulators, not unconnected with France, dealt severe blow to British finances, with the result that in September Great Briain went off the gold standard, followed by several smaller countries. This deplorable state of national and, consequently, internaional finance, with its accompanying unemployment, affected all countries, including the United States.

An unfriendly feeling against France developed in the United States and still continues. Franoe, conscious of her position as the most powerful state in Europe politically, financially, and militaristically—having the most successful diplomacy of any state since the World War, possessing the second largest gold supply, the largest army in the world, the second largest air force, the best artificially fortified frontiers, and a contemplated fleet equal in strength to the combined fleets of Germany and Italy—resented the intrusion and the lack of consideration shown her by the United States. Conscious of the enmity existing between the two nations, certain American groups, feeling that personal contact between the heads of the two nations would engender good relations, unofficially suggested to French officials that the French Premier should visit the United States. When Premier Laval stated that he would welcome an invitation, Mr. Hoover invited him.

Yet before the arrival of Premier Laval to the United States France withdrew gold in enormous quantities from her reserves in this country, and the flight from the dollar was in evidence in Europe, without any financial or economic reason but manipulated by a so-called international group with headquarters in Paris. Manipulation for political reasons was strongly suspected. The press openly warned us that the same forces that undermined the pound sterling were now at work on the dollar. Among the things accomplished during the Hoover-Laval conversations were the assurances by Premier Laval that abnormal movement of gold from New York would be stopped.

The Laval visit in October was followed the next month by Sigñor Grandi, Foreign Minister of Italy, on the invitation of Secretary Stimson. Why did he visit this country? He himself stated that he came to bring "a message of friendship from the Italian to the American people," "to offer the Italian contribution to the common work for the common good," to further "the peaceful cooperation of all nations in the world," and in the Italian Senate last Friday he added that he had made the trip as "a simple gesture of good will." He was desirous of coming, and was invited to reveal the Italian viewpoints and to learn the American viewpoints on such subjects as arms reduction, reparations, the gold standard, and treaty revision. It was an antidote to the Laval visit. The Italian views on most European problems are directly opposed to those of the French. The visit of Grandi offset any suspicion that the United States were taking sides in the Franco-Italian naval controversy, yet has tended to smooth the difficulties which will necessarily arise in the approaching disarmament conference, and should leave the United States in a more advantageous position, as the Italian and United States views on disarmament are in agreement. As no communique memorandum was issued it is extremely difficult to state in detail the exact value of the conference. But President Hoover is to be commended for this diplomatic move in including Italy in the countries invited to the United States. The wisdom of the Grandi invitation may be appreciated and seen in its true light when it is realized that during Laval's visit to this country the Italian Foreign Minister was meeting with German officials in Berlin. He could, therefore, present not only the Italian but the German viewpoint to President Hoover.

This particular phase of Grandi's mission recalls to our mind that there are not only three great powers in Europe but a fourth, namely, Germany. We are reminded that our President has issued three out of four invitations, the last of which was mainly of etiquette. Could it be possible that he inadvertently overlooked this fourth great European power? Does he not realize that it is 13 years since the World War, and that international organization and international good will must be, as its name implies, truly international? Did the President not perceive the joy of the French-America population during the Laval visit and the excitement of the Italian-American population over Grandi's sojourn? Did he not sense the dejection and disappointment of our citizens of German extraction at his failure to so honor a German statesman? The good will and interests of 11,000,000 of our population should not be so lightly disregarded. If courtesy was the basis of the Grandi invitation, surely an invitation is due Germany.

Possibly, however, the topics discussed during the Laval conversations were not of interest to Germany. It was the German press which stated that Grandi would be able to give

Mr. Hoover the latest information about Germany. In Germany at least German interests would bulk largely in the Hoover-Laval conversations. What are the facts? The French desire the cooperation of the United States in a program of reconstruction based upon a recognition of the existing territorial situation in Europe, and a recognition that the peace treaties can not be revised. Laval hoped that the President would implement the Kellogg pact by promising support against a recognized aggressor state, or at least to suspend any economic or political intercourse with such aggressor state. Surely all these questions—territorial status quo, the unrevised peace treaty, and putting teeth into the Kellogg pact—are of supreme interest to Germany.

Disarmament was also discussed. Laval revealed the usual French thesis, that security must precede disarmament and that France intends to maintain its present armaments and its political alliances with the States of Central Europe until the French nation obtains guarantees. This problem, too, is of vital interest to Germany. If France with her present armaments feels insecure, imagine the feeling of insecurity of Germany condemned by the peace treaty to remain absolutely unprotected. It is not to be surprised that Germany has declared that unless the other nations abide by their agreement to disarm that she will rearm. This impending danger could, by itself, furnish topic for an American-German conversation, such as has taken place between Laval and Hoover and Grandi and Hoover. By showing our sympathy with Germany and the justice of her cause, friendly counsel could allay German uneasiness until the other states of Europe awakened a consciousness of their responsibilities and their treaty obligations.

Debts and reparations as well as the moratorium were discussed in the Laval-Hoover conversation. Laval explained to the President the European situation viewed through the French eyes. Yet Germany so far has not been permitted the same privilege nor the same honor. Moreover the agreement in this regard is not very flattering to either Germany or the United States. France received the President's consent to the continuance of the Young plan of German reparation payments, the willingness of the United States to revise, if necessary, the European debt-funding agreements without exacting in return a promise that France would reduce her heavy land armaments and the satisfaction that any proposal by the United States to extend the Hoover moratorium would not be put forward without consulting France—all problems that concern the very life of Germany. It is extremely difficult to understand how President Hoover could really issue invitations to other countries. Since he has blessed the attempt of France to arrange Europe according to her own plans he could have little but meaningless courtesies to exchange with other foreign statesmen.

Have we not been approaching this problem from the wrong point of view? At the preparatory disarmament conference, Mr. Gibson warned " so long as the approach to the problem is based upon old fears and old suspicions there is little hope of disarmament." Has this not been our policy? Could we not assist Germany by showing her more consideration? Germany is a pivotal point in continental politics. It is a great possible storm center in present-day world finance. The critical nature of events in Germany and the importance of Germany in Europe is attested by the events of the past few days.

On what basis has President Hoover decided to reject the German point of view? For what purpose has he failed to take into account the existence of this proud nation and the feelings of 28 per cent of our population? Could we not prevail on the President to send an invitation to the President of Germany to visit the United States himself or to send a representative? At the present time, President von Hindenburg is the one great remaining bulwark against extremists' excesses in Germany. He was nominated and elected by a nationalist bloc, but proved a sore disappointment to his nationalistic sponsors. A facist coup in Germany would almost certainly shake all Europe. The present structure of European stability is too flimsy to make welcome new shocks. Hindenburg by preventing Hitler obtaining power by force, although he may do so by constitutional means, has contributed directly to the stability of Europe. An invitation to President von Hindenburg would be most pleasing to the American citizens of German extraction, most acceptable to the Germans themselves, and serve as a prelude to a finer understanding and sympathy in the conduct of international relations. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the majority leader I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I am not going to engage in any political discussion, but I shall try in the time allotted of 30 minutes to give my views on the question that is now before us for consideration, which is the moratorium proposed by the President. This is a question that is being brought out by every reading man and woman in the United States.

We have heard much said this morning in criticism of some of the declarations on this side, and if I should make a statement that is not borne out by the truth and the record, I invite your criticism.

We had here this morning one gentleman on your side, either appointed or self-elected, who is the watchdog of the Treasury and the guardian censor of the RECORD, that denied me the privilege of putting into the RECORD an article in honor of the first President of the United States, who was so ably lauded by our distinguished friend from Pennsylania, Mr. BECK.

If the gentleman from Massachusetts should devote his whole life to the study of George Washington he could not put into print as much with reference to that great President, George Washington, as this tribute to him did.

Then we had another thing to happen—the gentleman from Pennsylvania criticized our young boy from Alabama, Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not need to say anything for him, because he can take care of himself anywhere.

We are to-day considering the message sent in the usual way by the President of the United States to the Congress.

We have three departments of government—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. These three departments of government should ever function, under the Constitution of the United States, separate and apart from interference with each other.

The question of the right of the President to make treaties has been correctly stated here, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] this morning very ably answered that by saying that this is not a treaty. He could not make a treaty without confirmation by the other body—the Senate—and that is the reason that it was placed there as a safeguard for the making of treaties.

I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] that in dealing with international questions we ought to deal with them fairly, and we ought to follow the President of the United States as far as consistency and safety and the best interests of our country demands, but no farther.

Let us look at the question before us here to-day. I am not placed in the attitude of some of my friends in this legislative body.

I presume that I received the same wire from the President of the United States which each of you received.

I knew that this question was brewing when we were here in Congress assembled before adjournment. You knew it and your President knew it. I ask you and I ask him why, if he can explain to the country—why it was that he waited until the Congress had adjourned and then, in a way not provided by the Constitution of the United States, asked each Member of Congress to commit himself—not for permission to make a treaty but permission to do what? To give a moratorium. That was a matter which Congress had well settled, as was stated by the gentleman from Texas this morning. Congress acted on this, and a settlement was made and the President of the United States had as much right to call on you to give your consent on a question of modification of the prohibition act as he had on this question.

I say to you that this procedure is setting a dangerous precedent. I immediately wired the President myself the same day that I got his message that I did not think his proposition was wise at this time, for the reason that our country was not in a position to carry out this moratorium if we wanted to.

He is not going to be disappointed in me when I vote against this moratorium, because I gave him that information on the day that he gave me his.

The President of the United States says that he initiated this proposition, and that is true. The German Government never initiated it or asked for it even. Whoever heard before of a great nation that had a debt owing to it and before it was due, long before, taking up negotiations with the creditor to keep him from paying? Some of the press is carrying to-day the information that some of these foreign nations were ready and had made provision for paying this debt now, but are being advised by one of the departments of this Government that it is not necessary to do so, that it is not going to be taken now. When you go back and face Bill Jones at home, how are you going to square your actions with that situation? On the other hand, you look in the face of a man and tell him you are ready to give him a moratorium on your debt and let it pass back to him, and then come back and plead that we are facing a $2,000,000,000 deficit in the United States and ask that taxes be levied on the now debt-burdened public to raise this sum.

I want to show you gentlemen, if I can—and I am honest in my conclusion on this—that it is the proposed moratorium that is one of the things that has hurt business conditions in the United States. Our people are not a set of dumb corpses. They are reading. They know very well, and you are learning now, the trend of this whole matter and what it means. It is not a question of the $246,000,000 a year payment that would come to us now so much, had it not been for this moratorium, but the agitation goes very much further. Here we come, now, facing this question with another matter of the reappointment of the committee to revise the debts already passed on and agreed to by foreign nations. No man is so blind that he can not see the purpose underlying this whole thing. How has it affected the country? The business men of this country know very well that whatever financial burden you take off the shoulders of England and France and Germany and other nations you are going to lay back on the shoulders of the American business men and American taxpayer, and no man can escape that conclusion. The business world knew that.

The President tells you that money is paralyzed; that about half of it is, and I think 60 per cent, not only paralyzed, but hidden away, and so far as the business relations of this country are concerned it is dead. How are you going to get it into action? Not only that, but the business men see very plain the earmarks of some one else who is to be benefited by this. I don't charge the President of the United States with being in league with the international bankers and working for them, but I do say this, and every man who is capable of thinking knows very well, that the international banker is the man who is going to be benefited by it. Here they are with their billions that are due them. If they can get the United States to step out of the way and roll back its debt, and they get theirs, then maybe the debtor will pay you afterwards, if he can. Not only that, but here is the worse effect it has had upon the business in the United States. You talk about frozen assets and paralyzed money, and money that is hidden away, and the destruction of confidence. What does it mean? Every man who thinks knows that the $11,000,000,000 that the foreign nations owe us now is involved in this question. I believe as firmly as I believe I am here, and you know it, that if we pass the moratorium now, we will never collect the full amount of the indebtedness that is justly due us. The business world knows that. The business world knows that if you give $11,000,000,000 more to these foreign nations that the debt burden must come back and lie on their shoulders and their business. And you come in here with your tax measure and tell them that you are going to do it. Talk about frozen assets! You are going to have them congealed. You are going to make an iceberg out of the finances of America with the procedure that you are starting out on. The business world knows that if $11,000,000,000 is given to foreigners they must bear that burden. We owe now about $16,500,000,000 of money for bonds that have been sold to our people.

You are fixing to lay that burden back on the shoulders of the business interests of the country and that is the reason that you are paralyzing it. It is your policy, your frozen policy, your policy that is going to wreck and ruin, as it has almost done now, the business of America. Oh, you have your big meetings over in another country. One of our humorists said last year that if the President was going to have a Cabinet meeting he would have to call it in Berlin, Paris, or London, in order to get a quorum. If the thought and energy that has been put into this had been put into a solution of the business problems of America, would not our condition to-day have been far different from what it is now? What did they do over there? Seven of the great powers got together, sat there and dined—I do not know whether they wined or not; I do not suppose they did—but they dined over there for about 10 days, and passed a resolution which is a wonderful thing. They passed a resolution asking the creditor who had loaned Germany $100,000,000 for 30 days to extend it for 90 days. That was a wonderful achievement, was it not? God bless you, in America at the same time, our streets and street corners were congested with people going to the banks trying to get an extension on their indebtedness and could not get it. They were asking for that while Germany has not asked you for this. Are you going to take the bread away from your American people and feed some one else in a foreign land?

Much has been said here to-day about the conditions prevailing with reference to money in other countries. That is one of the troubles now, and you see it in the press to-day, that possibly there is going to be a scaling down because a certain nation has gone off a certain standard, and their money will not have such a buying power in the United States. Are you going to try to underwrite the loss of foreign nations? If our Government is committed to a policy of that kind in general, we will be a wrecked nation financially. We will have a nation that will have no confidence in business, and you can not restore business.

The President says that the railroads are in bad condition and that they must have some legislation for help. They certainly are in a bad condition. Something like two years ago I stood on the floor of this House and told you in a speech of some of the conditions that were hamstringing the railroads of the country, that have almost wrecked and ruined them by this time. I speak of the Interstate Commerce Commission, with its power to make rules and regulations, that has absolutely paralyzed the railroads. They have made a rate with a penalty to it; they fixed a rate from every shipping point in a State to every other point, and with a penalty against them if they were to cut their rate in any manner. They should cut loose from that and turn the railroads loose and let them have a chance to run their own business awhile. If you will do that you will help them very materially.

We have heard much argument here to-day about the effect of the tariff. Now, in the time that is allotted to me I can not give you my views on that. I do not think there is a man who is fair and not partisan but who will acknowledge that the last tariff bill is out of joint. It is not a tariff bill that America needs or demands or wants. I am not opposed to a well-balanced tariff. We, as Democrats, were the authors of it, and you have run away with it. What we need in America is a well-balanced tariff bill and a scaling down of rates where it keeps us out of competition or out of a chance of trading with other nations. We need now, which we do not have in the bill, a reciprocal trading relation with other countries. We will have to come to the position of Germany, which last week wanted to buy some wheat from us, and Russia owed her money, and she said, "You must take wheat for money."

One of the smartest things which our Farm Board has done is that it traded wheat to Brazil for coffee. If you can not let us have any money, if you are going to adopt a policy that is going to freeze it and paralyze it, then give us some chance to open trade relations with other countries and sell our cotton to them at a price that will permit the continued raising of it.

The President says there is lack of confidence. Well, why not? Who, as a business man, is going to have confidence in the conditions that prevail. It is said that 95 per cent of the business of the world is done on confidence. This is not a partisan measure. We will do everything in our power, working with the President, to try to right conditions that prevail. I want a policy on the part of Democrats, a constructive policy, which will lead us out of this dilemma in which you Republicans have placed us. The President says in his message, and that is one of the peculiar things, that this is a farm-relief measure. That it is going to give relief to the farmers of the country. Do you know that at the time the moratorium was declared cotton was worth 11 cents a pound? You saw it go down to 5 and 6 cents where it is now. Wheat was worth around 40 cents, and it went down to 25 cents. If you call that farm relief, then give us just as little of it as you possibly can. I believe in farm relief. I would like to see a measure passed that would be effective. I think the schedules put into the tariff bill on farm products were a slight help in some respects. Eighty per cent of them are not effective at all, but some of them have been effective. I think we should get together and write a common-sense tariff, well balanced, that the country would have confidence in. Then let us establish trade policies that will restore confidence. The main thing to restore confidence is to let the world know that we are not going to give away $11,000,000,000 in money that is owed to us, and force it back on the backs of our tax-burdened people.

The Under Secretary of the Treasury the other night made a speech to raise $800,000,000, and he wants to raise it largely by taxation. I would suggest to him that if we would stop the moratorium where it is now and let them pay this debt he will have almost half of it in cash, which belongs to this Government, and then he can float some bonds like they have been doing, and the world will be glad to take them. The United States will take them. They will all take them.

The President pleads for economy. I am for the kind of economy which he pleads for, but not for that which has been practiced by his administration. In my opinion, Congress was never more reckless in many of its appropriations. You will remember the first fight I ever made on the floor of this House—and I made it single-handed and alone—for economy. If you had heard my words of warning and practiced that you would have been far better off than you are now.

The President does give one feature in his message that is consoling to us. He said the health of the country is better. I guess that is a Republican blessing, but I thought it came from above and not from the White House. [Laughter and applause.]

Here is another hue and cry from the Post Office Department wanting to raise the price of postage on a letter that John Jones writes to his daughter in some other county. Ah, gentlemen, you heard the distinguished Texan [Mr. PATMAN] stand here on your subvention idea and your recklessness in postal expenditure, and he showed exactly what has brought about that condition. I will say to that department that whenever you get out that bill raising postage higher than 2 cents on letters, I am ready to contribute my part in defeating that proposition. The country does not want it. The country will not have it. Bring your expense of operation within the revenue derived from it.

It is not caused by first-class postage. If you want to raise the rates on postage, place the increased rates on something else rather than on letters. Place it where the deficit comes from and on that class of mail.

There are many other things I would like to talk to you about, but time is valuable and I shall not. I would like to talk to you about the farmers and the conditions from which our farmers are suffering. You remember that in the last session Members from my State and myself stood here and plead with you for a people that was suffering at that time in a drought-stricken area. There they were, suffering through no fault of their own. At first you wanted to lend them a pittance of $25,000,000, but we persuaded you to give them a $65,000,000 loan. I am glad to say to you, coming back from those people, that to-day those people are much better off. They were an energetic people and they put forth every effort within their power, so that to-day they have more food for man and more feed for beast than they have ever had before. That is because of the energy that has been put forth by my people. But they have no money and can not sell what they have produced.

I do not see my distinguished friend from Indiana, Mr. WILL WOOD, but you will remember that he stood in his place as chairman of the Appropriations Committee and said that a hunger movement which started at England, Ark., in my district, was a communistic movement. I would like to say to him in the RECORD, if he is not here, that the very people who were relieved by the charity and good graces of those who could help made a great crop, and 15 trucks from England, Ark., were loaded to the brim with food and carried over to Henrietta, Okla., to feed the starving miners. That is the kind of a movement it was and that is the kind of people we have there.

Let us get together on this proposition of restoring confidence in the people, and there is not an argument that will convince them quicker than to say to the American people once for all that this Congress is committed against any further revision of the debts; that that is a thing that is past; that the debts must be paid and not borne by the people of this country. That will restore their confidence. If you force these debts on the backs of the people, then you will be in trouble.

There is another thing suggested in the President's message that I do like. There is a reference in it with regard to home building and the securing of homes. I believe in that. With the disturbed conditions in the United States our agricultural sections will have to take care of more than half of the population of the United States. If we can lend any hand of help to them by way of financing, in buying a little farm, in buying a little home and having credit to pay it off, I am with the President on it. I want to see some policy adopted that will encourage home building. The very first evidence of a good citizen is he who when he is able purchases and owns a little home, in which he can be the ruling king.

What is our condition to-day? We have the greatest crop that was ever made and no place to market it; no price for anything they have to sell.

If I thought the moratorium was the remedy I would support it, but I say to you that my honest conviction is that the suggestion along this line and the now proposed reconsideration of that question is a disturbing feature in our land. Let us silence that alarm by saying we will not do it. There may be enough of you committed to the President's plan of a moratorium to pass it, but I am sorry for you, and I do not know what you are going to say to John Jones when you go home. My people know where I stand. I am not going to have to apologize for breaking faith with the President, because I have never been with him on this proposition, and I am sorry for those who are. If it is the wise thing to do, so much the better. If I am wrong in my contention and you are right I hope the country will get the benefit of it. But I say to you gentlemen that if you pass this bill providing for a moratorium there ought to be an amendment put on it which would say to the world that thus far and no farther thou shalt go. It is now time for you gentlemen to say whom you will serve. Choose you this day whom you will serve. Will it be the people or the international banks? Will you serve the foreign nations further or will you serve your home people? You have been generous and kind. We have given them $10,000,000,000. That is, you have; I voted against it. We went over there and sacrificed billions of dollars ourselves which we asked nobody to pay. We have gone over there and sacrificed human lives and shed the blood of the best boys of America in order to pay a debt of gratitude to them and to restore the peace of the world. We have gone far enough. Let us say that America hereafter shall be for the development of America. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE]. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, the subject to which I am to address myself has been admirably summarized by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] in a remarkable address that should receive reflection on the part of all Members of the House and, indeed, of all thoughtful citizens. It falls to me to take up the more prosaic task of confuting the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] out of the mouths of those who wrote the Constitution and were its contemporary expounders.

The gentleman from Texas on Friday, in the course of his remarks relating to the moratorium, for debts owed to us by foreign countries, said the President—

> Had no authority to negotiate, much less authority to act. Neither the Constitution nor the Congress directed or commissioned him to proceed.

And farther on—

> The President of the United States had no more authority to do what he did than John Smith or Bill Brown or anybody else.

And still farther on—

> If it is not a treaty which he undertook to negotiate, in so far as he presumed to speak for this Government, it was, in a sense at least, a usurpation of power bestowed by the Constitution on the Congress.

The gentleman from Texas is one of the most respected Members of the House, a man we all recognize as eminent in the practice of his profession, and there is no man in the House on either side of the aisle who does not rejoice that inasmuch as his party is to organize the House he is to be the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. [Applause.]

But sir, even the ablest lawyers, when not thinking a matter through, have reached wrong conclusions. That is a trait of human nature. Even Homer nodded, and in this instance, the gentleman from Texas, in my opinion, has nodded grievously. He disclosed in the course of his remarks that he had not recently perused the pages of history relating to the purchase of Louisiana. I fear that in the hurry of his tasks here he has not of late reread statements pertinent to this matter by those who framed and those who advanced and those who put into force the Constitution.

I would recall to him that the doctrine of the separation of the powers, wherein I most heartily agree in general with his views, was advanced by Montesquieu in the Spirit of Laws, and had more to do than any one other influence with shaping our frame of government. Montesquieu developed this doctrine in describing the Government of England. In that country never had it been dreamed that anybody save the chief executive, the Crown, should take charge of foreign relations. When our fathers saw fit to form the Government under which we live it was the universal belief throughout the world that foreign affairs were an executive function.

After the Constitution had been framed its adoption by the States was in large measure secured by the publication of the papers that put in one volume came to be known as the Federalist. This volume and Madison's Journal are our most authoritative sources of information as to what the Constitutional Convention meant by what it said. To them we turn for light on such a question as this.

The Federalist was the work of James Madison, Alexander Hamilton, and John Jay, the first two of whom had sat in the convention. I would read for the benefit of the gentleman from Texas and the House what Alexander Hamilton said about the functions of the executive department. It is to be found in the sixth of his papers on the subject of the Executive, No. 72 of the Federalist:

> The actual conduct of foreign relations, the preparatory plan of finance, the application and disbursement of the public moneys in conformity to the general appropriations of the legislature, the arrangement of the Army and Navy, the direction of the operations of war—these and other matters of like nature constitute what seems to be most properly understood by the administration of government.

Here a member of that convention, expounding to the country what it had done, places at the very head of the functions of the executive department "the actual conduct of foreign relations."

There was another man in that convention, a man who sat in the chair of the presiding officer all through its deliberations, George Washington. He became our first President, and his was the first duty to put in force the Constitution, to live up to its principles, to follow closely what had been prescribed. Surely no man here will deny he knew what he was doing when he became President of the United States. The instrument he was to enforce contained a provision that my friend from Texas has wholly overlooked:

> The President shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

George Washington had not occupied the presidential chair for two years before he had occasion to follow out this injunction in a matter here completely relevant. I would read one of his messages that you may know what the first President understood as to the duties of the President. In those days the President conceived that he should split his annual message into parts addressed, respectively, to the Senate, to the House, and to the Senate and House, allotting to each part of the message the information and recommendation that he thought, in view of constitutional provisions, might be appropriately considered by the Senate alone, the House alone, or by both the Senate and House. Special messages were likewise addressed with meticulous care as to the constitutional proprieties. In the message I will next read not only notice the stage in the proceedings involved that had been reached but also pay attention to the implications of the form of address.

> UNITED STATES, February 14, 1791.
> Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives:
> Soon after I was called to the administration of the Government I found it important to come to an understanding with the Court of London on several points interesting to the United States and, particularly, to know whether they were disposed to enter into arrangements by mutual consent which might fix the commerce between the two nations on principles of reciprocal advantage. For this purpose I authorized informal conferences—

Mark you that. The first President, the man who had presided over the Constitutional Convention, in his first message throwing linght on the issue of the present moment, said to the Senate and the House, not to the Senate alone, as would have been the case had it been a treaty matter—

> I authorized informal conferences with their ministers, and from these I do not infer any disposition on their part to enter into any arrangements merely commercial. I have thought it proper to give you this information, as it might at some time have influence on matters under your consideration.
> G° WASHINGTON.

Will you tell me that George Washington knew nothing about the separation of the powers? Will you tell me that he knew nothing about the duties of the Executive? Will you tell me that he usurped the functions of the House of Representatives when he authorized his ministers in London to engage in informal conferences in order that the results thereof might be put before the House of Representatives?

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Not at the moment.

I would further quote from another message of the first President, addressed likewise to the "Gentlemen of the Senate and the House of Representatives," on the 28th of February, 1795, after four years of opportunity to reflect upon whether in 1791 he had made that wretched mistake now attributed to the President of the United States.

He said:

> Our minister near the French Republic has urged compensation for the injuries which our commerce has sustained from captures by French cruisers, from the nonfulfillment of the contracts of the agents of that Republic with our citizens, and from the embargo at Bordeaux.

You will see he still believed that negotiations with foreign powers, even though not necessarily leading to treaties, were a duty imposed upon him by the Constitution, a belief that has been accepted by every President since, a belief unquestioned until—I hope not but I fear—for some political purpose, it is brought into this discussion.

I am willing to follow the gentleman from Texas in matters of law when only legalistic ends are involved, but if and when he engages in constitutional argument for political advantage, I decline to tread in his footsteps.

He appears to base his argument on the proposition that such negotiations as those referred to in the messages from which I have quoted might result in treaties and, therefore, would come within the power of the President to make treaties—a power which, of course, includes the preliminaries—but the quoted language warrants no such inferences. Clearly the negotiations reported by Washington did not necessarily involve the treaty-making power.

Possibly he could have advanced this argument with some weight when I asked him about the purchase of Louisiana, but he took another angle of the subject when he answered he was advised that Thomas Jefferson had the consent of Congress before he engaged in the Louisiana purchase.

"He was advised." He admitted in effect that he had not reviewed the circumstances of the case. My surmise is that the information came to him from another Member near at hand who also is highly respected by reason of his knowledge of constitutional matters as well as his personal qualities and who doubtless gave the information without refreshing his memory. Very likely neither gentleman grasped the scope and purpose of my inquiry. Our minds did not meet. My interest was not in what came after Congress took a hand in the matter, but in the earlier negotiations. Let me tell you of them.

Hardly had Thomas Jefferson taken the oath of office when news came from Rufus King, our minister in London, that Spain had made a secret cession of our great Louisiana Territory to France, its former owner.

In September, 1801, Robert Livingston, duly appointed minister to Spain, was told before sailing that if he could obtain West Florida from France or by means of French influence, such a proof on the part of France of good will toward the United States would reconcile us to seeing Bonaparte at New Orleans. In April and May of 1802 the cession of the Floridas, or at least of West Florida, was pressed by the President still more directly and earnestly, and it was not until the following winter that Congress took any part in this matter. Toward the end of December the President laid before the House certain considerations which led it to shut its doors and to pass a week in secret deliberations. After that week, after those deliberations, the historians give us to understand that as a result came the first proposal by Congress or either branch for the purchase of Louisiana. You will see that more than a year earlier, without consulting the House, without informing the country, Jefferson had instructed his minister to proceed in this particular matter, and that in respect of protest no treaty possibility was involved.

I know my friend from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] will say that a treaty followed. He will attempt to draw the thin line between treaties and other arrangements. He lays down before us a proposition that the President may negotiate for the making of a treaty, but may not negotiate for the making of a law. Such finespun, casuistical argument ought not to be offered in this discussion. It is a theme for constitutional experts who like to quarrel over minute details. It is not a matter that ought to be introduced into this solemn discussion of what should be done to save the world. It is brought in, I fear—I hope not—but everything indicates that it is brought in to befog the issue, to take us away from the main question at stake, the question of whether we will back up the President in the conduct of foreign relations that was imposed on him by the Constitution of the United States. It may be that men in this body will be so biased by the hair-splitting argument that they will stop reflecting on the real issue. It may be that they will attempt in still other ways to confuse this issue, but I am sure that the people of the United States will look through all these subterfuges, all these pretexts, all these flimsy reasons for taking our attention away from the main question, and will demand that we back up the President of the United States in his conduct of foreign relations. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it has been intimated that the question immediately under consideration has been raised in order to becloud the main issue. I reply that the main issue is injected into this particular phase of the discussion in order, under its screen, to justify and fix a dangerous precedent. At the beginning of my remarks I want to say that in my judgment no Member on either side of the House ought to be influenced in his vote upon the moratorium by the question which I have raised and which has just been discussed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE]. Let us get that clear and get that out of the way. This question, this matter of the precedent, ought not to be discussed from a partisan standpoint. It is a matter of no importance whether this question immediately under consideration arose during the administration of a Republican President or a Democratic President. I feel justified in observing to my friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts, that it ought to be possible for a Member of the House on either side of the Chamber to discuss a matter of the privileges of the House without his motives being brought in question.

Whenever the time comes that a Member of the House may not stand in his place and defend what he believes to be the constitutional rights, privileges, and duties of the legislative branch without embarrassing himself or without embarrassment to anybody else, then I say to my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] that his desire to prevent the Executive from absorbing the power of this Government will be of no avail. I undertook, I think I made it clear, that in my view at least it does not matter what Presidents may have done in the past.

Let us see where we are. I am going to discuss this question in such terms that any layman at home may understand. I, myself, do not quite appreciate how the history and tragedy of Rome becomes involved in this question. It is a clear-cut question. By the process of elimination we get rid of the treaty powers of the President, because this is not a treaty. Everybody agrees with that? The House has nothing to do with treaties. If it were a treaty, it would not be here. Then why confuse this consideration by talking about treaties? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] says I have overlooked the powers conferred upon the President by section 3 of Article II of the Constitution, from which he read:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

The gentleman from Massachusetts failed to read the language immediately following, which is—

> He may on extraordinary occasions convene both Houses.

The gentleman from Massachusetts failed to read the only part of that section which is pertinent. The section does show the constitutional plan for dealing with such questions and such conditions as the President, without authority, has dealt with. The plan and the power is in an extraordinary occasion to call Congress together and lay his views and information before it, and then, as the Executive, execute what Congress legislatively determines and makes a law. The constitutional powers of the President justifying this action with reference to the moratorium can not be found under either the treaty provisions of the Constitution or under section 3, Article II, which is the power to deliver messages to Congress and under extraordinary conditions to convene Congress in extra session.

Certainly, I agree the President has the general responsibility of negotiating with foreign countries in behalf of this Government. But he is not this Government and he can not speak for it in such matters as the proposed moratorium, which included a revenue item of over $11,000,000,000. He not only is not given that power by the Constitution but by the Constitution it is expressly denied to the Executive and given to the Congress—to the House in the first instance. As Mr. BECK said this morning, the President is the Chief Executive. He is not the originator of revenue policies.

The Constitution has put some very definite responsibilities upon the legislative branch of the Government, and a very definite responsibility upon the House of Representatives of the Congress. Perhaps its most important duty is to deal with the public revenue. Certainly it is its most distinctive responsibility. So here we have the picture—the responsibility of the House to deal in the first instance with revenue matters, the duty of the Congress as a whole to determine the revenue policy of the Government in its details, and the duty of the President to execute the will of the Government, which is expressed through Congress. The Congress of the United States is the official spokesman for the American people with regard to their revenue policies. If that power is to be turned over to the President and Congress become a rubber stamp, why have a Congress; why not have a king and save the expense? When the President undertook to deal with this matter he certainly did not undertake to deal with it as the Executive. Suppose you think about that for a moment. What was he trying to execute? May I draw your attention to the fact that Congress had acted definitely on this proposition of the payment of the principal and interest of the foreign debts with regard to which the President acted. The judgment of the Congress has been taken with regard to this matter, and the President became then the executor of the will of Congress expressed in this Chamber and in the other Chamber. Will anybody dispute that? We appointed a debt-funding commission which made an examination of the whole question and made a report to the Congress. The Congress examined this report of the Debt Funding Commission and legislated on that report. As the Executive there were two courses authorized by the Constitution. One was to have the law carried out as it had been enacted.

The other course, if the President felt that subsequent events made the carrying out of the law hurtful, an "extraordinary occasion," then to convene Congress, submit his message, as provided for in the provision of the Constitution quoted, and get a new law, a new judgment from Congress, if it agreed. Then go to our foreign creditors as the Executive of the Government. The act referred to is the law. It was the last word which the President of the United States ever had from that branch of the Government of whose will he is the executor. That will is as clear as it can be expressed in language. The President undertook upon his own responsibility, not to make a treaty, not to execute a law, but to disturb an arrangement solemnly declared and made in this Chamber and in the Senate and approved by the President of the United States. It became a law. Is that not true? Nobody will question that. How can a President, under the guise of executing the will of Congress as the Executive do that contrary to the expressed will of Congress? Possibly Congress was wrong. It may be that if the President had called Congress into session the Congress would have given the President authority to do what the President did. This is not a pleasant duty for me but it is a duty. Our Constitution is not changed solely by the method provided in the instrument itself. It is changed, speaking practically, by precedents also. The decisions of the Supreme Court show it. Our own obedience to precedents shows it. If the power exercised by the President in this instance is fixed by precedents, it will be to the hurt of representative government.

It is true the President sent some message to Members of the Congress—Members of the Senate and the House—inquiring of their attitude; but, gentlemen, you can not conduct the affairs of a great government by telegraph or even by parcel post. You can not change the direction given to the President by law in that way. How are we to preserve the division of the powers fixed in the Constitution—and that fixation is wise—if Members of Congress acquiesce, merely because the person whose conduct is under examination happened to be of their political party. What I said last week I repeat. The President of the United States in these negotiations had no more authority than Bill Smith or Tom Brown in my district or yours. His duties are fixed. He has his job cut out for him by the Constitution, and we have our responsibilities here—responsibilities to determine the very things that were determined when we examined the report of the fiscal commission and declared the legislative judgment, made a law for the guidance of the President in the discharge of his executive duties.

Now, I hope you will credit me with sincerity when I say that I regret this question has become involved in the consideration of the major question. But we are acting for the future as well as for the present. Ladies and gentlemen of this House, we have a responsibility here to the generations that are to come, because we know how powerful a precedent is.

I make the statement that the sort of procedure which has been had with reference to this transaction will inevitably result in confusion at home and discredit abroad. I do not care if it had been a Democratic President instead of a Republican President; that is not involved. The procedure had is not only contrary to the plan and the powers granted by the Constitution, but as a matter of fact it is too much power to put in the hands of one man. The Constitution did not put it there. The Constitution places the responsibility of dealing with the revenue of a great people in its own Congress. That is where it ought to remain.

What should have been done and the regular constitutional way to do it and the way I hope this Congress will give Presidents to understand it must be done, is that if a President feels that a thing ought to be done with regard to which Congress alone has the power to authorize him to do and the situation is too acute to await the regular convening of Congress, he should call the Congress into session and submit the matter. [Applause.]

Members of Congress are as concerned for the public interest as is the President. Members would have gladly responded to his call. That is the constitutional way, it is the natural way, not only in harmony with the Constitution but in harmony with the philosophy of representative government.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas two additional minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. All Presidents should submit such matters to the judgment of the Congress, and then when they go to Europe, or any other country, that country will know and it will be a fact that they speak by authority of the Government. Let me direct your attention to some very significant language. This is the introductory sentence of the President in this moratorium negotiation:

> The American Government proposes the postponement during one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts.

And so forth. How does he know the American Government does it? When did it come that the President of the United States is the American Government? I do not care if he said, "Subject to the approval of Congress," or whatnot. Where in the Constitution does the President get the right to speak, with regard to a revenue matter, the voice of the Government, especially when what he says is in the teeth of and contrary to the last expression of the Government?

Now, if any of you gentlemen want to answer that you can have plenty of time.

How can the President of the United States, when he speaks with regard to the revenue, say that the American Government speaks? These are the words of the President. As a matter of fact, the American Government had spoken back there a few years ago when it approved the conclusions and ratified the recommendations of the Debt Funding Commission, and that was the last word the President had from the American Government.

Ladies and gentlemen, I do not want to take any more time, but I want to plead with you—and I hope what I said in the beginning will be understood—that this question ought not to interfere with or influence the vote of any Member on this main question; but, ladies and gentlemen of the House, charged with the responsibility of supporting the Constitution of the United States, just because your President happened to do this, you ought not to surrender the right, the duty, the responsibility which the Constitution places in you to guard the distribution of powers as fixed in the Constitution, remembering that division resulted not from the judgment alone of those who sat in our Federal Constitutional Convention. That division had been recognized and fixed in the constitution of all the States. It had been fixed for centuries before the Revolution. That division has stood the test for centuries. It is perhaps the most substantial thing in our written Constitution. I would feel myself recreant to as high a duty as I owe, and I speak only for myself, if I did not register earnest protest against the character of procedure had in the matter. In concluding and in justice to the President I want to say I understand he had the approval of many Members of Congress before he acted. I regret that it is impossible to combat the precedent establishing tendency of these transactions without referring to the official out of whose actions the danger has developed. If I am concious of the motives which have prompted me during this debate, it is to prevent in what has occurred the establishment of a precedent acquiesced in by the House. If established, as certain as there is wisdom in the constitutional division of our powers, such a precedent would plague us, the Government, in the future. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

ESTATE AND GIFT TAXES

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, what I am about to say has absolutely no relation to anything that has been discussed here this afternoon, nor will it likely have relation to anything that will be discussed during the balance of the afternoon. I asked for time on last Friday to make some observations on the estate, inheritance, and gift taxes.

You older Members of the House know that that subject has been rather close to me ever since the war. Following the war for seven or eight years there was much agitation to repeal the Federal estate tax. Every time the Ways and Means Committee held hearings on tax measures I appeared in defense of the Federal estate tax. I did that on the bill of 1921, on the bill of 1924, on the bill of 1926, and on the bill of 1928.

For the benefit of you younger Members, I want to tell you that the Federal estate tax law was enacted in 1916. In 1918 the estate law was amended, making the maximum rate 25 per cent on that portion of an estate over $10,000,000.
